1. In 1980, 35 states, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico held presidential primaries. California Democrats and South Dakota Republicans and Democrats held state-type preference primaries. In New York, Democrats had a presidential preference, but Republicans held primaries for the selection of delegates only, without indication of presidential preference. In Mississippi, Republicans elected delegates by congressional districts pledged to candidates and the vote indicated is for the highest of each state's candidates in each congressional district. In Arkansas, the Republicans did not hold a primary although Democrats did. In South Carolina, the Democrats did not hold a primary but Republicans did. The vote in Ohio is for at-large delegates pledged to specific candidates and elected as a group. The Republican and Democratic primaries in Puerto Rico were held on two different dates: February 17 and March 16, respectively.

2. Bush withdrew May 26.

3. Baker withdrew March 5.

4. Connally withdrew March 9.

5. Brown withdrew April 1.

6. Anderson withdrew April 24.

7. Write-in vote.

8. Totals exclude Puerto Rico, where citizens are unable to vote in the general election.

1. Michigan's January primary was not sanctioned by the Democratic Party because it violated party rules that barred all but four states from holding primary contests before February 5, 2008. Michigan and Florida, which held its primary January 29, wanted to move their primaries earlier in the season to have more influence on selection of the candidate. The Democratic Party threatened to strip both states of all Democratic delegates to the national convention. Later a compromise was struck to reduce the penalty to half the delegates for each state. At the convention in June, with the race already decided in Obama's favor, both states had their full delegations seated. At the time of the January primary, however, all major candidates agreed officially not to campaign in Michigan or Florida, and Edwards and Obama had their names removed from the Michigan ballot. Clinton left her name on the Michigan ballot. She won a majority of delegates from both states.

2. Florida, like Michigan, moved its primary ahead of earliest date allowed by Democratic Party rules. (See details in footnote 1.)

3. The Democratic presidential primary was officially a caucus event but had attributes of a regular primary. It was run by the Democratic Party in the state and was open to registered Democrats exclusively, who could vote by mail or in person at the more than 150 caucus sites between noon and 7 p.m. on February 5. The results were used to assign pledged delegates to the candidates. The Republican primary was held June 3.

4. Washington's Democratic primary was nonbinding; delegates pledged to candidates were selected in caucuses. Washington's Republican primary selected only about half of the state's delegates; the other delegates were selected in caucuses.

5. Nebraska's Democratic primary was nonbinding; state Democrats selected delegates through caucuses in February.

6. West Virginia's Republican primary selected only 12 of the state's 30 delegates. A Feb. 5 convention selected 18 delegates.

7. Idaho's Democratic primary was nonbinding for delegate selection. Delegates were pledged to presidential candidates through county caucuses and a state convention.

Nominating Conventions

ALTHOUGH THE PRESIDENTIAL nominating convention has been a target of criticism throughout its existence, it has survived to become a traditional fixture of American politics. The convention owes its longevity and general acceptance in large part to the multiplicity of functions that the convention uniquely combines.

The convention is a nominating body that the Democrats, Republicans, and most of the principal third parties have used since the early 1830s to choose their candidates for president and vice president. The convention also produces a platform containing the party's positions on issues of the campaign. Convention delegates form the supreme governing body of the party and as such they make major decisions on party affairs. Between conventions such decisions are made by the national committee with the guidance of the party chair.

The convention provides a forum for compromise among the diverse elements within a party, allowing the discussion and often the satisfactory solution of differing points of view. As the ultimate campaign rally, the convention also gathers together thousands of party leaders and rank-and-file members from across the country in an atmosphere that varies widely, sometimes encouraging sober discussion but often resembling a carnival. But even though the process has drawn heavy criticism, the convention has endured because it successfully performs a variety of actions.

The convention is an outgrowth of the U.S. political experience. Nowhere is it mentioned in the Constitution, nor has the authority of the convention ever been a subject of congressional legislation. Rather, the convention has evolved along with the presidential selection process. The convention has been the accepted nominating method of the major political parties since the election of 1832, but internal changes within the convention system have been massive since the early, formative years.

CONVENTION SITES

Before the Civil War, conventions frequently were held in small buildings, even churches, and attracted only several hundred delegates and a minimum of spectators. Transportation and communications were slow, so most conventions were held in the late spring in a city with a central geographical location. Baltimore, Maryland, was the most popular convention city in this initial period, playing host to the 1831 Anti-Masonic gathering (America's first national nominating convention), the first six Democratic conventions (1832 through 1852), two Whig conventions, and one National Republican convention. With the nation's westward expansion, the heartland city of Chicago emerged as the most frequent convention center. Since its first one in 1860, Chicago has been the site of twenty-five major party conventions (fourteen Republican, eleven Democratic). The Democrats held their national convention in Chicago as recently as 1996. In 2008 the Democrats chose to meet in Denver, the second time the city had hosted a national party convention. The Republicans met in St. Paul; the GOP had met in St. Paul's twin, Minneapolis, once before.

Locating and Financing Conventions

Since 1976, presidential elections have been at least partially publicly funded. Early on, the newly created Federal Election Commission (FEC) ruled that host-city contributions to conventions are allowable, enabling the parties to far exceed the technical limit on convention spending. In 1988, for example, the FEC allotted the two major parties $9.2 million each in public funds for their conventions. The money came from an optional checkoff for publicly financing presidential campaigns on federal income tax forms. (Congress raised the original $1 checkoff to $3 per taxpayer, beginning in 1993.) In 1988 the Republicans, however, spent a total of $18 million on their New Orleans convention, while the Democrats spent $22.5 million in Atlanta. To attract the Democratic convention, Atlanta levied a special tax on hotel guests, which enabled the host committee to offer a package of $5 million in borrowed money. For both conventions, General Motors (with FEC permission) provided fleets of cars at an estimated cost of $350,000.

SITES OF MAJOR PARTY CONVENTIONS, 1832–2008

The following chart lists the twenty-two cities selected as the sites of major party conventions and the number of conventions they have hosted from the first national gathering for the Democrats (1832) and the Republicans (1856) through the 2008 conventions. The Democrats have hosted a total of forty-six conventions; the Republicans, thirty-nine. In this table, Minneapolis-St. Paul is counted as a single location.

Costs continued to soar for subsequent conventions. In 1992 the Democrats spent $38.6 million on their New York City meeting, according to political scientist Herbert E. Alexander. For the 1996 conventions, the FEC allotted the two major parties $12.4 million each in public funds, but the total spending for both parties, according to Alexander, was at least twice that amount. In 2000 the federal money given each of the two major parties for their conventions reached $13.5 million. The Reform Party was given $2.5 million. In the wake of the 2001 terrorist attacks, huge amounts were spent on additional security in 2004; the federal government alone allocated up to $50 million in assistance for each major convention that year. In addition to the federal spending on security and the FEC grant money of $14.9 million given to each major party, the FEC reported that the Democrats raised an additional $56.8 million for their convention in Boston, while the Republicans raised $85.7 million for New York City. In 2008 each party received $16.8 million in federal funds for their convention. In addition to that federal money, the Democrats reported receipts of $121.9 million and the Republicans $102.5 million for their respective conventions, according to the FEC. Furthermore, each host city once again received $50 million in federal assistance for security purposes.

Besides the amounts spent on security, major outlays typically go for construction, administration, office space, convention committees, and regular police and fire personnel. Besides adequate hotel and convention hall facilities, safety of the delegates and other attendees is increasingly a major consideration in selection of a national party convention site. The island location of Miami Beach, for example, made it easier to contain protest demonstrators and reportedly was a factor in its selection by the Republicans in 1968 and by both parties in 1972.

For the party that controls the White House, often the overriding factor in site selection is the president's personal preference—as in the GOP's decision to meet in 1992 in President George H.W. Bush's adopted home city of Houston, or the Democrats' decision to meet in Atlantic City in 1964, because President Lyndon Johnson wanted a site within helicopter distance of Washington and convenient to New York City. In 2004 the Republicans chose to meet in New York City, which had lost the World Trade Center in the

2001 terrorist attacks—a significant location for President George W. Bush, whose presidency had centered on responding to terrorism after September 11, 2001.

The national committees of the two parties select the sites about one year before the conventions are to take place.

Call of the Convention

The next steps in the quadrennial convention process follows several months after the site selection with the announcement of the convention call, the establishment of the three major convention committees—credentials, rules, and platform (resolutions)—the appointment of convention officers, and finally the holding of the convention itself. While these basic steps have undergone little change since the first conventions, there have been major alterations within the nominating convention system.

The call of the convention sets the date of the meeting (the site selection already being announced) and is issued early in each election year, if not before. The call to the first Democratic convention, held in 1832, was issued by the New Hampshire Legislature. Early Whig conventions were called by party members in Congress. With the establishment of national committees later in the nineteenth century, the function of issuing the convention call fell to these new party organizations. Each national committee currently has the responsibility for allocating delegates to each state.

DELEGATE SELECTION

Both parties have modified the method of allocating delegates to the individual states and territories. From the beginning of the convention system in the nineteenth century, both the Democrats and Republicans distributed votes to the states based on their electoral college strength.

The first major deviation from this procedure was made by the Republicans after their divisive 1912 convention, in which President William Howard Taft won renomination over former president Theodore Roosevelt. Taft's nomination was largely because of almost solid support from the South—a region vastly overrepresented in relation to its number of Republican voters. Before their 1916 convention the Republicans reduced the allocation of votes to the southern states. At their 1924 convention the Republicans applied the first bonus system, by which states were awarded extra votes for supporting the Republican presidential candidate in the previous election. The concept of bonus votes, applied as a reward to the states for supporting the party ticket, has been used and expanded by both parties since that time.

The Democrats first used a bonus system in 1944, completing a compromise arrangement with southern states for abolishing the party's controversial two-thirds nominating rule. Since then both parties have used various delegate-allocation formulas. At their 1972 convention the Republicans revised the formula and added more than 900 new delegate slots for 1976, increasing the size of the convention by two-thirds. The Ripon Society, an organization of liberal Republicans, sued to have the new rules overturned. They argued that because of the extra delegates awarded to states that voted Republican in the previous presidential election, small southern and western states were favored at the expense of the more populous but less Republican eastern states. The challenge failed when the Supreme Court in February 1976

Only 116 delegates from thirteen states attended the initial national nominating convention held by the Anti-Masons in 1831, but with the addition of more states and the adoption of increasingly complex voting-allocation formulas by the major parties, the size of conventions spiraled. The 1976 Republican convention had 2,259 delegates, while the Democrats in the same year had 3,075 delegates casting 3,008 votes. (The number of delegate votes was smaller than the number of delegates because Democratic Party rules provided for fractional voting.)

The expanded size of modern conventions in part reflected their democratization, with less command by a few party leaders and dramatic growth among youth, women, and minority delegations. Increased representation for such groups was one of the major reasons given by the Republicans for the huge increase in delegate strength authorized by the 1972 convention (and effective for the 1976 gathering).

1. The 1912 Republican convention nominated James S. Sherman, who died on Oct. 30. The Republican National Committee subsequently selected Nicholas Murray Butler to receive the Republican electoral votes for vice president.

The Democrats adopted new rules in June 1978, expanding the number of delegates by 10 percent to provide extra representation for state and local officials. The new Democratic rules also required that women account for at least 50 percent of the delegates beginning with the 1980 convention. That party's national convention continued to grow throughout the next decades—from 3,331 delegate votes in 1980 to a record 4,353 (and 611 alternates) in 2004. In 2004 almost 40 percent of the Democratic delegates were members of minority groups, another record. In 2008, the number was still higher, with minorities making up 42.6 percent. Of the 4,440 delegates (and 614 alternates) that year, women made up 50.1 percent.

The 2004 Republican convention also convened a record number of participants with 2,509 delegates and 2,344 alternates. Of these delegates and alternates, 44 percent were women and 17 percent were minorities, the highest percentage ever at a GOP convention. In 2008 the GOP convention included 2,380 delegates and 2,227 alternate delegates. Media reports indicated that the percentage of minority delegates was down from four years earlier.

With the increased size of conventions has come a formalization in the method of delegate selection, which at first was often haphazard and informal. At the Democratic convention in 1835, for example, Maryland had 188 delegates to cast the state's ten votes. In contrast, Tennessee's fifteen votes were cast by a traveling businessman who happened to be in the convention city at the time. While the number of delegates and the number of votes allocated tended to be equal or nearly so later in the nineteenth century, a few party bosses frequently exercised domination of national conventions.

Two basic methods of delegate selection were employed in the nineteenth century and continued to be used into the twentieth: the caucus method, by which delegates were chosen by meetings at the local or state level, and the appointment method, by which delegates were appointed by the governor or a powerful state leader.

Presidential Primaries

A revolutionary new mechanism for delegate selection emerged during the early 1900s: the presidential primary election in which the voters directly elected convention delegates.

Initiated in Florida at the turn of the century, the presidential primary by 1912 was used by thirteen states. In his first annual message to Congress the following year, President Woodrow Wilson advocated the establishment of a national primary to select presidential candidates: "I feel confident that I do not misinterpret the wishes or the expectations of the country when I urge the prompt enactment of legislation which will provide for primary elections throughout the country at which the voters of several parties may choose their nominees for the presidency without the intervention of nominating conventions.” Wilson went on to suggest the retention of conventions for the purpose of declaring the results of the primaries and formulating the parties’ platforms.

Before any action was taken on Wilson’s proposal, the progressive spirit that spurred the growth of presidential primaries faded. Not until the late 1960s and early 1970s, when widespread pressures for change touched both parties, but especially the Democratic, was there a rapid growth in presidential primaries. In the mid-1980s some states reverted to the caucus method of delegate selection, but their revival soon abated. A record forty-four primaries were held in 2000, including those in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. In 2004, with an incumbent president running unopposed on the Republican side, only thirty-seven states held primaries along with the District of Columbia.

In 2008 fifty-one states and territories held Democratic nominating events (primaries, caucuses, or state conventions); the Michigan and Florida contests, however, were controversial because they were held too early in the calendar, thus breaking party rules. Delegates from those states eventually were seated at the convention. On the Republican side, there were fifty-one contests. The majority of the contests on both sides of the aisle were primaries.

In many states participation in the presidential primary is restricted to voters belonging to the party holding the primary. In some states, however, participation by voters outside the party is allowed by state-mandated open primaries, usually with the caveat, though, that the party in which they cast a primary ballot is publicly recorded. (See Chapters 10 and 11.)

Democratic Rules in Recent Decades

In June 1982 the Democratic National Committee (DNC) adopted several changes in the presidential nominating process recommended by the party’s Commission on Presidential Nominations, chaired by Gov. James B. Hunt Jr. of North Carolina. The Hunt Commission, as it came to be known, suggested revisions to increase the power of party regulars and give the convention more freedom to act on its own. It was the fourth time in twelve years that the Democrats, struggling to repair their nominating process without repudiating earlier reforms, had rewritten their party rules. (See box, Changes in Democrats’ Nominating Rules, p. 495.)

One major change in the Democrats’ rules was the creation of a new group of “superdelegates,” party and elected officials who would go to the 1984 convention uncommitted and would cast about 14 percent of the ballots. The DNC also adopted a Hunt Commission proposal to weaken the rule binding delegates to vote for their original presidential preference on the first convention ballot. But the new rule also allowed a presidential candidate to replace any disloyal delegate with a more faithful one.

One of the most significant revisions was the Democrats’ decision to relax proportional representation at the convention and end the ban on the “loophole” primary-winner-take-all by district. Proportional representation is the distribution of delegates among candidates to reflect their share of the primary or caucus vote, both statewide and in congressional districts. Mandated by party rules in 1980, it was blamed by some Democrats for the protracted primary fight between President Jimmy Carter and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. Because candidates needed only about 20 percent of the vote in most places to qualify for a share of the delegates, Kennedy was able to remain in contention. But while the system kept Kennedy going, it did nothing to help his chances of winning the nomination.

Although the Democrats’ 1984 rules permitted states to retain proportional representation, they also allowed states to take advantage of two options that could help a front-running candidate build the momentum to wrap up the nomination early in the year.

One was a winner-take-more system. States could elect to keep proportional representation but adopt a winner bonus plan that would award the top vote-getter in each district one extra delegate.

The other option was a return to the loophole primary, which party rules outlawed in 1980 (with exemptions allowing Illinois and West Virginia to retain their loophole voting systems). In the loophole states, voters balloted directly for delegates, with each delegate candidate identified by presidential preference. Sometimes several presidential contenders would win at least a fraction of the delegates in a given district, but the most common result is a sweep by the presidential front-runner, even if he or she has less than an absolute majority. Loophole primaries aid the building of a consensus behind the front-runner, while still giving other candidates a chance to inject themselves back into the race by winning a major loophole state decisively.

The DNC retained the delegate-selection season adopted in 1978, a three-month period stretching from the second Tuesday in March to the second Tuesday in June. But, in an effort to reduce the growing influence of early states in the nominating process, the Democrats required Iowa and New Hampshire to move their highly publicized elections to late winter. Party rules maintained the privileged status of Iowa and New Hampshire before other states but mandated that their initial nominating rounds be held only eight days apart in 1984. Five weeks had intervened between the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary in 1980. (The window was extended to four months for 2004 and 2008.)

CHANGES IN DEMOCRATS' NOMINATING RULES

Between 1972 and 1992 Democrats tinkered with their nominating rules every four years, producing a system that, if not better than before, was always different. Since 1992, however, the party left its rules basically unchanged. The following chart shows the ebb and flow of the Democratic Party's rules changes, with a "✓" indicating the years these major rules were in effect.

	1972	1976	1980	1984	1988	1992	1996	2000	2004	2008
Timing: Restrict delegate-selection events to a three-month period (the "window"), which was extended to four months for 2004 and 2008.			✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Conditions of Participation: Restrict participation in delegate-selection events to voters who declare themselves Democrats.		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Proportional Representation: Ban all types of winner-take-all contests. Ban all types of winner-reward contests (where winner receives extra delegates).			✓			✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Delegate Loyalty: Give candidates the right to approve delegates identifying with their candidacy. Bind delegates to vote for their original presidential preference at convention on first ballot.		✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Party and Elected Officials: Expand each delegation to include pledged party and elected officials. Further expand each delegation to include unpledged party and elected officials ("superdelegates").			✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓
Demographic Representation: Encourage participation and representation of minorities and historically underrepresented groups (affirmative action). Require delegations to be equally divided between men and women.			✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓	✓

The DNC also retained rules requiring primary states to set candidate filing deadlines thirty to ninety days before the election and limiting participation in the delegate-selection process to Democrats only. This last rule eliminated cross-over primaries where voters could participate in the Democratic primary without designating their party affiliation. African Americans and Hispanics won continued endorsement of affirmative action in the new party rules. Women gained renewed support for the equal division rule, which required state delegations at the national convention to be divided equally between men and women.

The Democratic Party's 1988 presidential nominating process remained basically the same as that used in 1984. The rules adopted by the national committee included only minor modifications suggested by the party's rules review panel, the Fairness Commission.

The bloc of uncommitted party and elected officials (superdelegates) was expanded slightly to 16 percent and rearranged to reserve more convention seats for members of Congress, governors, and the DNC; the rules restricting participation in Democratic primaries and caucuses to Democrats only was relaxed so the open primaries in Wisconsin and Montana could be conducted with the approval of the national party; and the share of the vote a candidate needed to win in a primary or caucus to qualify for delegates was lowered from the 20 percent level used in most places in 1984 to 15 percent.

Only the rule regarding the 15 percent "threshold" spawned much debate during the rules-writing process, and

POLITICAL PARTY ORGANIZATION AND RULES

Political parties in the United States are loosely organized. Anyone of voting age can become a party member simply by signing up. Millions of Americans do just that, while many others shun formal partisan affiliations but think of themselves as Democrats or Republicans nonetheless.

Cowboy humorist Will Rogers used to get laughs by saying, "I am not a member of any organized party. I am a Democrat." But the same line could also be applied to the Republicans, even if they sometimes seemed to be less disorganized than their major rivals.

Both parties have the same fluidity of membership, with the rolls open to independents as well as to supporters of the other party. Formally registering as a Democrat or Republican has the advantage of permitting the member to participate in the party's nominating primaries and caucuses. Most states bar crossover voting in the other party's elections, largely for fear that members of one party would try to nominate the weakest candidates of the opposing party.

There is little evidence, however, that most rank-and-file voters are as concerned about parties as such. In recent elections, roughly three times as many voters have participated in the presidential election as have taken part in the parties' presidential primaries. In 1995, for the first time ever, a plurality of voters surveyed by the Gallup poll identified themselves as "other" (36 percent) rather than as Republican or Democratic (32 percent each). In 2004 the trend slightly dipped with 32 percent polled by Gallup identifying themselves as "other," and Republican or Democratic identification at 34 percent each. A Gallup survey in June 2008, however, showed a jump in voters leaning Democratic: 37 percent of registered voters identified themselves as Democrats, 28 percent as Republicans, and 34 percent as independent, "other," or "don't know."

PARTY STRUCTURE

Loose though it is, each major party has an organizational structure—a necessity for continuing as an institution, fund-raising, and conducting election campaigns. Congress has officially recognized the role of the parties, and public funding is provided for their presidential nominating conventions. Some states also provide funding for election campaigns.

Beginning at the precinct or neighborhood level, a series of progressively larger units make up the national organization. Next up the line are city, county, legislative district, congressional district, and, just below the national committee, the state organizations.

There is no "chain of command." Each unit is more or less independent. The national chair exerts influence mainly through prestige and force of personality, rather than through any specified powers. The national committee elects the chair, but the president actually designates the chair of the party controlling the White House.

With approximately 440 members, the Democratic National Committee (DNC) is more than twice the size of the 165-member Republican National Committee (RNC). The smaller DNC executive committee includes a mix of party officers, regional representatives, "at-large" members elected by the DNC, and others representing Democratic affiliates.

Since 1984 the Democrats have occupied their national headquarters at 430 South Capitol Street, S.E., in Washington. Previous locations in New York and Washington (including the Watergate offices burglarized by the Republicans in 1972) were rented.

Besides the chair, eight other DNC officers are specified in the party charter and elected by the national committee: five vice chairs, treasurer, secretary, and national finance chair. Party organizations in the states and territories elect their DNC members for four-year terms, ending with the next convention. They are the state chair and the next highest-ranking member of the opposite sex. Another 200 votes are distributed on a population basis, with each state or territory guaranteed at least two, equally divided among men and women.

Other DNC members are two U.S. senators, two House members, two members of the College Democrats, and three representatives each from among Democratic governors, mayors, state legislators, county officials, municipal officials, Young Democrats, and the National Federation of Democratic Women, as well as two representatives each from among lieutenant governors, secretaries of state and state treasurers, and several dozen at-large members.

The RNC elects at least a dozen officers for two-year terms—the chair, cochair, eight vice chairs, secretary, treasurer, and any other officer deemed necessary. The party owns its national headquarters at 310 First Street, S.E., in Washington. The Republicans maintain a large field staff and generally have had more money than the Democrats to dispense to campaigns.

Because of their large sizes, the full national committees seldom meet more than a few times during the four years between the national conventions, which are the parties' supreme governing bodies. In both parties, the day-to-day work of the national organization is done by the chair and the headquarters staff, under direction of the executive committee.

OPERATING RULES

The most important rules of both major parties deal largely with the selection of delegates to the quadrennial national nominating conventions. While the Democrats in the 1970s and 1980s experimented widely with these rules, mainly to give more representation to women, youth, and minorities, Republicans left their rules largely unchanged until the 1990s. (See box, GOP Primary Rules, p. 497.)

Beginning with reforms proposed by Sen. George S. McGovern of South Dakota, who won the nomination himself in 1972, the Democratic Party attempted to "democratize" the process. A succession of commissions headed by Barbara A. Mikulski of Maryland (1972), Morley Winograd of Michigan (1976), Gov. James B. Hunt Jr. of North Carolina (1980), and Donald L. Fowler of South Carolina (1984) succeeded in gaining equal representation for women, requiring proportional representation of delegates among primary vote-getters, and giving convention votes to "superdelegate" party and elected officials.

For the 1992 convention, Democrats for the first time in two decades did not have a special commission intensively examining the nominating process. Since 1992 the Democratic Party has left its rules largely unchanged. (See "Democratic Rules in Recent Decades," p. 494.)

GOP PRIMARY RULES

The Republican Party, wrote political scientist Nelson W. Polsby, “in many respects remains unreformed.” Virtually anything has been permitted in the nominating process so long as it was not baldly discriminatory. That has been the way GOP leaders have wanted it—at least until recent years.

While the Democratic Party has a tightly crafted, nationalized set of rules that govern its nominating process, Republicans historically have shunned control by a central authority. The individual GOP state parties have been given wide latitude to determine how their delegates are selected, with guidelines from the national party kept to a minimum.

The result has been a nominating procedure with a simplicity and continuity that the Democrats lack. A more homogeneous party than the Democrats, the Republicans until the late 1990s had not felt the pressure for rules reform that had engulfed the Democrats as long as the GOP was winning presidential elections. No major rules changes were made by the Republicans between 1974 and 1996.

For the year 2000, though, the Republicans instituted bonus delegates for those states that chose their delegates to the national convention after the middle of March. The quickness of the 1996 decision convinced many party leaders that a longer selection process would be more desirable.

though the discussion of the issue seldom was acrimonious, it did reveal a yawning chasm in the party on what the proper role of the national convention should be.

Most party leaders, including DNC chairman Paul G. Kirk Jr., wanted a threshold of at least 15 percent because they thought it would help steadily shrink the field of presidential candidates during the primary and caucus season and ensure that the convention would be a “ratifying” body that confirmed the choice of the party’s voters.

But civil rights leader and presidential candidate Jesse L. Jackson saw it differently, as did a cadre of liberal activists. They wanted a convention that was more “deliberative,” and they complained that getting one was virtually impossible under the system as it existed because it discriminated against long-shot candidates and produced an artificial consensus behind one candidate.

Most Democratic leaders were satisfied with the way the nominating process operated in 1984, and they felt it would be a disaster for the party to go through a free-wheeling, multiballot convention. Not since 1952—at the beginning of the television age—has a national party taken more than one ballot to nominate its presidential candidate.

At the DNC meeting where the new rules were approved, some African American committee members joined with a few white liberal activists in proposing to eliminate the 15 percent threshold altogether. The proposal was rejected by voice vote. A second proposal to lower the threshold to 10 percent was defeated 92 to 178.

At the 2000 GOP convention, the party voted to eliminate the bonus delegates but added automatic seats for Republican National Committee members at the 2004 convention as well as increased the base delegate vote total of every state. Yet even in earlier years when Republicans had a laissez faire approach to their nominating process, they were not able to operate totally in their own world. Campaign finance laws and the rising influence of mass media affected Republicans as well as Democrats. In states where legislatures accommodated the Democrats and created a presidential primary, the Republicans were dragged along.

The Republican Party held twenty primaries in 1972, but during the next three decades the number of primaries steadily increased. In 2000 the party held a record forty-four primaries, including those in the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. Primaries helped to select roughly 85 percent of delegates to the GOP convention in 2000. In 2004, with an incumbent president running unopposed for the nomination, the Republicans held only twenty-seven primaries in which a vote was recorded. That number increased to forty-one in 2008, with a lame-duck president and a competitive nomination process.

In 1990 the DNC made two basic changes that directly affected the delegate-selection process for the 1992 convention. One change moved forward the officially sanctioned start of the presidential primary season by one week, from the second Tuesday in March to the first. This was an invitation to California to move its 1992 primary from June to March 3. (California declined in 1992 but in 1996 moved its primary from June to late March. This was part of a desire by both parties in 1992 to speed up the nominating contest and settle it by April or early May, so that united parties could organize their conventions with eyes focused on the November election.) The second change banned winner-reward systems, which gave extra delegates to the winner of a primary or caucus. Fifteen states had used some form of a winner-reward system in 1988.

The Democrats required all states in 1992 and thereafter to divide their publicly elected delegates proportionally among candidates who drew at least 15 percent of the primary or caucus vote. The Democratic Party also continued to steadily increase the number of superdelegates, expanding their number to 802 for the 2000 convention (or 18.5 percent of the 4,339 delegate votes). In 2004 the number of superdelegates dropped slightly to 733, or 16.8 percent; in 2008 it rose again, with 853 superdelegates (or 19 percent of the delegates).

During the 1972–1996 period the Republican Party followed an entirely different approach and made few changes in its nominating rules. While the Democratic rules were revised somewhat for each presidential cycle, the GOP rules remained stable. For the year 2000, however, the Republicans reconsidered the desirability of the nomination contest being over by March or April; they decided to provide a bonus for those states that chose their delegates to the 2000 GOP convention after the ides of March.

Before the 2000 convention was even held, though, Republicans were considering even more controversial solutions to spread out the primary calendar, which had become congested with events in February and March. The so-called Delaware Plan would have put the smallest states at the beginning of the nominating season in 2004, the largest states at the end. But after winning the approval of the Republican National Committee (RNC) at its preconvention meeting, the proposal was killed by the convention rules committee at the behest of the party standard-bearer, Gov. George W. Bush of Texas, who wanted to remove any semblance of controversy.

Republicans, however, made several changes in delegate-selection rules for 2004, including elimination of the bonus delegates and creation of automatic seats for members of the RNC. (See box, GOP Primary Rules, p. 497.)

Credentials Disputes

Before the opening of a convention the national committee compiles a temporary roll of delegates. The roll is referred to the convention's credentials committee, which holds hearings on the challenges and makes recommendations to the convention, the final arbiter of all disputes.

Some of the most bitter convention battles have concerned the seating of contested delegations. In the twentieth century most of the heated credentials fights concerned delegations from the South. In the Republican Party the challenges focused on the power of the Republican state organizations to dictate the selection of delegates. (See box, Notable Credentials Fights, p. 500.)

The issue was hottest in 1912 and 1952, when the party throughout most of the South was a skeletal structure whose power was restricted largely to selection of convention delegates. Within the Democratic Party the question of southern credentials emerged after World War II on the volatile issues of civil rights and party loyalty. Important credentials challenges on these issues occurred at the 1948, 1952, 1964, and 1968 Democratic conventions.

There were numerous credentials challenges at the 1972 Democratic convention, but unlike those at its immediate predecessors, the challenges involved delegations from across the nation and focused on violations of the party's newly adopted guidelines.

After their 1952 credentials battle, the Republicans established a contest committee within the national committee to review credentials challenges before the convention. After their divisive 1968 convention, the Democrats also created a formal credentials procedure to review all challenges before the opening of the convention.

Equally important to the settlement of credentials challenges are the rules under which the convention operates. The Republican Party adopts a completely new set of rules at every convention. Although large portions of the existing rules are enacted each time, general revision is always possible.

After its 1968 convention, the Democratic Party set out to reform itself and the convention system. The Commission on Rules and the Commission on Party Structure and Delegate Selection, both created by the 1968 convention, proposed many changes that were accepted by the national committee. As a result, a formal set of rules was adopted for the first time at the party's 1972 convention.

CONTROVERSIAL RULES

Although it did not have a formal set of rules before 1972, the Democratic Party had long operated with two controversial rules never used by the Republicans: the unit rule and the two-thirds nominating rule. The unit rule enabled the majority of a delegation, if authorized by its state party, to cast the entire vote of the delegation for one candidate or position. In use since the earliest Democratic conventions, the unit rule was abolished by the 1968 convention.

From their first convention in 1832 until the 1936 convention, the Democrats employed the two-thirds nominating rule, which required any candidate for president or vice president to win not just a simple majority but a two-thirds majority. Viewed as a boon to the South because it allowed that region a virtual veto power over any possible nominee, the rule was abolished with the stipulation that the South would receive an increased vote allocation at later conventions.

In its century of use the two-thirds rule frequently produced protracted, multiballot conventions, often giving the Democrats a degree of turbulence the Republicans, requiring only a simple majority, did not have. Between 1832 and 1932, seven Democratic conventions took more than ten ballots to select a presidential candidate. In contrast, in their entire convention history, the Republicans have had just one convention that required more than ten ballots to select a presidential candidate. That occurred in 1880 when the GOP required thirty-six ballots before nominating Rep. James A. Garfield of Ohio. (See box, Democrats' Two-Thirds Rule, p. 499; "1880 Conventions," pp. 552, 694.)

One controversy that surfaced during the 1980 Democratic Party convention concerned a rule that bound delegates to vote on the first ballot for the candidates under whose banner they had been elected. Supporters of Senator Edward Kennedy had devoted their energy to prying the nomination from incumbent President Carter by defeating that rule. But the final tally showed 1,936.42 delegates favoring the binding rule and 1,390.58 opposing it. Passage of the binding rule ensured Carter's renomination, and shortly after the vote Kennedy announced that his name would not be placed in nomination.

DEMOCRATS' TWO-THIRDS RULE

At their first convention in 1832 the Democrats adopted a rule requiring a two-thirds majority for nomination. Two presidential candidates—Martin Van Buren in 1844 and Champ Clark in 1912—received majorities but failed to attain the two-thirds requirement.

On the first ballot in 1844 former president Van Buren received 146 of the 266 convention votes, 54.9 percent of the total. His total fell under a simple majority on succeeding roll calls, and on the ninth ballot the nomination went to a dark-horse candidate, former governor James K. Polk of Tennessee.

In 1912 from the tenth through the sixteenth ballots House Speaker Clark recorded a simple majority. He reached his peak on the tenth ballot, receiving 556 of the 1,094 convention votes, 50.8 percent of the total. The nomination, however, ultimately went to New Jersey governor Woodrow Wilson, who was selected on the forty-sixth ballot.

At their 1936 convention the Democrats voted to end the requirement for a two-thirds majority for nomination.

CONVENTION OFFICERS

Credentials, rules, and platform are three of the major convention committees. Within the Republican Party, though, the committee on permanent organization ratifies the slate of convention officials. In the Democratic Party, the rules committee recommends the officials.

In both the Democratic and Republican parties, the presiding officer during the bulk of the convention is the permanent chairman. For much of the postwar period, the position has gone to the party's leader in the House of Representatives, particularly at the GOP convention. (See Table 12-5, p. 501.)

However, this loose precedent was broken in the Democratic Party by a rule adopted at the 1972 convention requiring that the presiding officer position alternate every four years between the sexes.

PARTY PLATFORMS

The adoption of a party platform is one of the principal functions of a convention. The platform committee is charged with the responsibility of writing a party platform to be presented to the convention for its approval.

The main challenge before the platform committee has traditionally been to write a platform all party candidates can use in their campaigns. For this reason, platforms often fit the description given them by Wendell L. Willkie, Republican presidential candidate in 1940: "fusions of ambiguity." (See box, Major Platform Fights, p. 502.)

Despite the best efforts of platform-builders to resolve their differences in the comparative privacy of the committee room, they sometimes encounter so controversial a subject that it cannot be compromised. Under these conditions dissident committee members often submit a minority report to the convention floor. Open floor fights are not unusual and, like credentials battles, often reflect the strength of the various candidates.

When the party has an incumbent president, the platform often is drafted in the White House or at least has the approval of the president. Rarely does a party adopt a platform that is critical of an incumbent president of the same party. When Democratic delegates at their 1896 convention, inspired by William Jennings Bryan's "Cross of Gold" speech, repudiated President Grover Cleveland and his support for a gold standard for hard currency, and nominated Bryan for president on a "free silver" platform, they signaled a major sea change in American politics. A similar change took place in 1948, when Democratic delegates led by Mayor Hubert Humphrey of Minneapolis overturned a recommendation by the platform committee and precipitated a walkout of southern delegates by adopting a strong civil rights plank. Although overridden, President Harry S. Truman accepted the Humphrey plank—and won with it.

The first platform was adopted by the Democrats in 1840. It was a short document, fewer than 1,000 words. Since then the platforms with few exceptions have grown longer and longer, covering more issues and appealing to more and more interest groups. One of the exceptions to the growth trend was the 4,500-word Democratic platform of 1988—about one-tenth the length of the 1984 platform. In 2004 the Democratic platform was 19,500 words; the Republican platform was more than twice as long at almost 48,000 words. The 2008 Democratic platform was approximately 26,500 words; the 2008 Republican platform was a little more than 20,000, much shorter than four years earlier.

Third Parties: Radical Ideas

Throughout U.S. history, many daring and controversial political platforms adopted by third parties have been rejected as too radical by the major parties. Yet many of these proposals later have won popular acceptance and have made their way into the major party platforms—and into law. Ideas such as the abolition of slavery, prohibition, the graduated income tax, the popular election of senators, women's suffrage, minimum wages, Social Security, and the

NOTABLE CREDENTIALS FIGHTS

1848, Democratic. Two rival New York state factions, known as the Barnburners and the Hunkers, sent separate delegations. By a vote of 126 to 125, the convention decided to seat both delegations and split New York's vote between them. This compromise suited neither faction: the Barnburners bolted the convention; the Hunkers remained but refused to vote.

1860, Democratic. Dissatisfaction with the slavery plank in the party platform spurred a walkout by several dozen southern delegates from the Charleston convention. When the tumultuous convention reconvened in Baltimore six weeks later, a credentials controversy developed on the status of the bolting delegates. The majority report of the credentials committee recommended that the delegates in question, except those from Alabama and Louisiana, be reseated. The minority report recommended that a larger majority of the withdrawing Charleston delegates be allowed to return. The minority report was defeated, 100½ to 150, prompting a walkout by the majority of delegates from nine states.

1880, Republican. Factions for and against the candidacy of former president Ulysses S. Grant clashed on the credentials of the Illinois delegation. By a margin of 387 to 353, the convention rejected a minority report that proposed seating pro-Grant delegates elected at the state convention over other delegates elected at a congressional district caucus. Three other votes were taken on disputed credentials from different Illinois districts, but all were decided in favor of the anti-Grant forces by a similar margin. The votes indicated the weakness of the Grant candidacy. The nomination went to a dark-horse candidate, Rep. James A. Garfield of Ohio, on the thirty-sixth ballot.

1912, Republican. The furious struggle between President William Howard Taft and former president Theodore Roosevelt for the nomination centered on credentials. The Roosevelt forces brought seventy-two delegate challenges to the floor of the convention, but the test of strength between the two candidates came on a procedural motion. By a vote of 567 to 507, the convention tabled a motion presented by the Roosevelt forces barring any of the delegates under challenge from voting on any of the credentials contests. This procedural vote clearly indicated Taft's control of the convention. All the credentials cases were settled in favor of the Taft delegates, and the presidential nomination ultimately went to the incumbent president.

1932, Democratic. Two delegations favorable to the front-runner for the presidential nomination, Franklin D. Roosevelt, came under challenge. However, in a show of strength, the Roosevelt forces won both contests: seating a Louisiana delegation headed by Sen. Huey P. Long by a vote of 638¾ to 514¼ and a Roosevelt delegation from Minnesota by an even wider margin, 658¾ to 492¾. Roosevelt won the nomination on the fourth ballot.

1952, Democratic. The refusal of three southern states—Louisiana, South Carolina, and Virginia—to agree to a party loyalty pledge brought their credentials into question. The Virginia delegation argued that the problem prompting the loyalty pledge was covered by state law. By a vote of 650½ to 518, the convention approved the seating of the Virginia delegation. After Louisiana and South Carolina took positions similar to that of Virginia, they were seated by a voice vote.

1952, Republican. Sixty-eight delegates from three southern states (Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas) were the focal point of the fight for the presidential nomination between Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower and Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio. The national committee, controlled by forces favorable to Taft, had voted to seat delegations friendly to the Ohio senator from these three states. But by a vote of 607 to 531 the convention seated the Georgia delegation favorable to Eisenhower. It seated the Eisenhower delegates from Louisiana and Texas without roll calls. The general went on to win the presidential nomination on the first ballot.

1968, Democratic. A struggle between the anti-Vietnam War forces, led by Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota, and the party regulars, headed by Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey, dominated the seventeen cases considered by the credentials committee. Three of the cases, involving the Texas, Georgia, and Alabama delegations, required roll calls on the convention floor. All were won by the Humphrey forces. By a vote of 1,368¾ to 956¾, the regular Texas delegation headed by Gov. John B. Connally was seated. A minority report to seat the entire Georgia delegation led by black leader Julian Bond was defeated, 1,043.55 to 1,415.45. Another minority report to seat a McCarthy-backed, largely black delegation from Alabama was also rejected, 880¾ to 1,607. Humphrey, having shown his strength during the credentials contests, went on to win an easy first ballot nomination.

1972, Democratic. The first test of strength at the convention between Sen. George McGovern's delegates and party regulars came over credentials. Key challenges brought to the convention floor concerned the South Carolina, California, and Illinois delegations. The South Carolina challenge was brought by the National Women's Political Caucus in response to alleged under-representation of women in the delegation. Although the caucus's position was supposedly supported by the McGovern camp, votes were withheld to avoid jeopardizing McGovern's chances of winning the important California contest. The caucus's challenge lost 1,429.05 to 1,555.75. The California challenge was of crucial importance to McGovern, because it involved 151 delegates initially won by the South Dakota senator in the state's winner-take-all primary, but stripped from him by the credentials committee. By a vote of 1,618.28 to 1,238.22, McGovern regained the contested delegates, thereby nailing down his nomination. With victory in hand, the dominant McGovern camp sought a compromise on the Illinois case, which pitted a delegation headed by Chicago's powerful mayor Richard Daley against an insurgent delegation composed of party reformers. Compromise was unattainable, and with the bulk of McGovern delegates voting for the reformers, a minority report to seat the Daley delegates was rejected.

MAJOR PLATFORM FIGHTS

1860, Democratic. A minority report on the slavery plank, stating that the decision on allowing slavery in the territories should be left to the Supreme Court, was approved, 165 to 138. The majority report (favored by the South) declared that no government—local, state, or federal—could outlaw slavery in the territories. The acceptance of the minority report precipitated a walkout by several dozen southern delegates and the eventual sectional split in the party.

1896, Democratic. The monetary plank of the platform committee, favoring free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 with gold, was accepted by the convention, which defeated a proposed gold plank, 626 to 303. During debate William Jennings Bryan made his famous “Cross of Gold” speech supporting the platform committee plank, bringing him to the attention of the convention and resulting in his nomination for president.

1908, Republican. A minority report, proposing a substitute platform, was presented by Sen. Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin. Minority proposals included increased antitrust activities, enactment of a law requiring publication of campaign expenditures, and popular election of senators. All the proposed planks were defeated by wide margins. The closest vote was for the direct election of senators, which lost 114 to 866.

1924, Democratic. A minority plank was presented that condemned the activities of the Ku Klux Klan, then enjoying a resurgence in the South and some states in the Midwest. The plank was defeated 542<sup>7</sup>/<sub>20</sub> to 543<sup>3</sup>/<sub>20</sub>, the closest vote in Democratic convention history.

1932, Republican. A minority plank favoring repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment (Prohibition) in favor of a state-option arrangement was defeated, 460 <sup>2</sup>/<sub>9</sub> to 690 <sup>19</sup>/<sub>36</sub>.

1948, Democratic. An amendment to the platform, strengthening the civil rights plank by guaranteeing full and equal political participation, equal employment opportunity, personal security, and equal treatment in the military service, was accepted, 651<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> to 582<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub>.

1964, Republican. An amendment offered by Sen. Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania to strengthen the civil rights plank by including voting guarantees in state as well as in federal elections and by eliminating job bias was defeated, 409 to 897.

1968, Democratic. A minority report on Vietnam called for cessation of the bombing of North Vietnam, halting of offensive and search-and-destroy missions by U.S. combat units, a negotiated withdrawal of U.S. troops, and establishment of a coalition government in South Vietnam. It was defeated, 1,041<sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> to 1,567<sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub>.

1972, Democratic. By a vote of 1,852.86 to 999.34, the convention rejected a minority report proposing a government guaranteed annual income of $6,500 for a family of four. By a vote of 1,101.37 to 1,572.80, a women's rights plank supporting abortion rights was defeated.

1980, Democratic. The platform battle, one of the longest in party history, pitted President Jimmy Carter against his persistent rival, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts. Stretching over seventeen hours, the debate focused on Kennedy's economics plank, which finally was defeated by a voice vote. Yet Carter was forced to concede on so many specific points, including Kennedy's $12 billion antirecession jobs programs, that the final document bore little resemblance to the draft initially drawn up by Carter's operatives.

1992, Democratic. A tax fairness plank offered by former senator Paul E. Tsongas of Massachusetts was defeated by a vote of 953 to 2,287. The plank called for a delay in any middle-class tax cut and tax credit for families with children until the deficit was under control.

eighteen-year-old vote were advocated by Populists, Progressives, and other third parties long before they were finally accepted by the nation as a whole.

The radical third parties and their platforms have been anathema to the established wisdom of the day, denounced as impractical, dangerous, destructive of moral virtues, and even traitorous. They have been anti-establishment and more far-reaching in their proposed solutions to problems than the major parties have dared to be. (See box, Third Parties Usually Fade Rapidly, p. 503.)

Major Parties: Broader Appeal

In contrast with the third parties, Democrats and Republicans traditionally have been much more cautious about adopting radical platform planks. Trying to appeal to a broad range of voters, the two major parties have tended to compromise differences or to reject controversial platform planks.

The Democratic Party has been more ready than the Republicans to adopt once-radical ideas, but there is usually a considerable time lag between their origin in third parties and their eventual adoption in Democratic platforms. For example, while the Democrats by 1912 had adopted many of the Populist planks of the 1890s, the Bull Moose Progressives of that year already were way ahead of them in proposals for social legislation. Not until 1932 were many of the 1912 Progressive planks adopted by the Democrats.

Similarly, it was not until the 1960s that Democratic platforms incorporated many of the more far-reaching proposals originally put forward by the 1948 Progressive Party in that year.

THIRD PARTIES USUALLY FADE RAPIDLY

Most third-party movements are like shooting stars, shining brightly in one election and then quickly disappearing. Since 1832, eleven third parties—plus independents John B. Anderson in 1980 and H. Ross Perot in 1992—have drawn at least 5 percent of the popular vote in a presidential election.

As of 2008 none of these third parties or independents were able to maintain their footholds in the electoral process. Four had disappeared by the next election, six others drew smaller vote totals, and three endorsed one of the major parties. The Reform Party, which first received 8.5 percent of the vote in 1996 with Perot atop its ticket, confirmed this pattern in 2000 when its candidate Patrick J. Buchanan only received 0.4 percent. Perot had received his highest popular vote percentage (18.9 percent) in 1992 when he first ran for president as an independent.

Each of the significant third parties, except the Socialists in 1912, made its best showing in its first election. (The Socialists, led by Eugene V. Debs, first ran in 1900, winning just 0.62 percent of the vote.) The following chart lists each party's presidential candidate and the percentage of the vote the party received in its most successful race and in the following election. A dash (—) indicates that the party had disappeared.

Party (candidate)	Year	Percentage of vote	Next election
Anti-Mason (William Wirt)	1832	7.8%	endorsed Whig
Free Soil (Martin Van Buren)	1848	10.1	4.9%
Whig-American (Millard Fillmore)	1856	21.5	—
Southern Democrats (John C. Breckinridge)	1860	18.1	—
Constitutional Union (John Bell)	1860	12.6	—
Populist (James B. Weaver)	1892	8.5	endorsed Democrat
Progressive (Bull Moose) (Theodore Roosevelt)	1912	27.4	0.2
Socialist (Eugene V. Debs)	1912	6.0	3.2
Progressive (Robert M. La Follette)	1924	16.6	—
American Independent (George C. Wallace)	1968	13.5	1.4
John B. Anderson (Independent)	1980	6.6	endorsed Democrat
H. Ross Perot (Independent)	1992	18.9	8.5 (Reform Party)
Reform Party	1996	8.5 (Perot)	0.4 (Buchanan)

FILLING VACANCIES

Starting with the Democratic convention of 1848, and the Republican Party's first national organizing meeting in 1856, both major parties have elected national committees to run the day-to-day business of the parties between conventions.

Since their beginning, one of the most important functions of national committees has been to replace a candidate who dies or resigns after the convention adjourns, or after election day but before the electors cast their votes for president and vice president. This replacement power was assumed informally, but without controversy, at first. It was granted by several national conventions during the Progressive Era (1900–1912) and was made part of both parties' permanent standing rules by the 1920s.

There have been four such vacancies.

In 1860 the Democratic designee for vice president, Sen. Benjamin Fitzpatrick of Alabama, declined the nomination after the ruinously chaotic Baltimore convention of that year finally adjourned. The national committee then nominated former governor Herschel V. Johnson of Georgia as Sen. Stephen A. Douglas's running mate.

TABLE 12-6 Chief Officers at Other National Party Conventions, 1831–1892

Year	Party	Temporary chair	Chair
1831	Anti-Masonic		John C. Spencer, N.Y.
1831	National Republican	Abner Lacock, Pa.	James Barbour, Va.
1839	Whig	Isaac Bates, Mass.	James Barbour, Va.
1844	Whig	Andrew F. Hopkins, Ala.	Ambrose Spencer, N.Y.
1848	Whig	John A. Collier, N.Y.	John M. Morehead, N.C.
1852	Whig	George C. Evans, Maine	John G. Chapman, Md.
1843	Liberty		Leicester King
1848	Free Soil		Charles Francis Adams, Mass.
1852	Free Soil (Free Democrats)		Henry Wilson, Mass.
1856	American (Know-Nothing)		Ephraim Marsh, N.J.
1860	Southern Democrat (Breckinridge)		Caleb Cushing, Mass.
1860	Constitutional Union		Washington Hunt, N.Y.
1872	Liberal Republican	Stanley Matthews, Ohio	Carl Schurz, Mo.
1880	Greenback	Gilbert De La Matyr, Ind.	Richard Trelvellick, Mich.
1888	Prohibition	H. A. Delano, Conn.	John P. St. John, Kan.
1892	Prohibition	John P. St. John, Kan.	Eli Ritter, Ind.
1892	People's (Populist)	C. H. Ellington, Ga.	H. L. Loricks, S.D.

In 1872 the Democratic nominee for president, Horace Greeley, founder of the New York Tribune, died shortly after election day. (Incumbent Republican president Ulysses S. Grant had won the election.) Greeley's dispirited party's national committee declined to select a replacement candidate, and the Democratic electors voted for four different candidates.

In 1912 Vice President James S. Sherman of New York died in office the week before election day. The Republican convention of that year had authorized the national committee to fill vacancies, and the committee quickly replaced Sherman. His name remained on state ballots as President William Howard Taft's running mate, but the eight Republican electors voted, as recommended by the committee, for the replacement candidate, Nicholas Murray Butler of New York, president of Columbia University. The Taft ticket did not win reelection, losing to Democrat Woodrow Wilson.

Finally, in 1972, the Democratic nominee for vice president, Sen. Thomas Eagleton of Missouri, resigned his candidacy after the convention adjourned. Eagleton just ten days after his selection disclosed that he had voluntarily hospitalized himself three times between 1960 and 1966 for "mental exhaustion and fatigue." Initially, the nominee for president, Sen. George McGovern, supported Eagleton, but in the following days his support waned and Eagleton withdrew. McGovern recommended R. Sargent Shriver of Illinois, former head of the Peace Corps, as his replacement running mate, and Shriver was selected by a special meeting of an expanded national committee. (See "1972 Conventions," p. 625.)

COMMUNICATIONS AND THE MEDIA

Major changes in the national nominating convention have resulted from the massive advances in transportation and communication technologies during the past century.

The revolution in transportation has affected the scheduling of conventions. In the nineteenth century, conventions were sometimes held a year or more before the election and at the latest were completed by late spring of the election year. With the ability of people to assemble quickly, conventions in recent years have been held later in the election year, usually in July or August. Advances in transportation also have affected site location. Geographic centrality is no longer a primary consideration in the selection of a convention city.

Radio coverage of conventions began in 1924, television coverage sixteen years later. One of the first changes inspired by the media age was the termination of the custom that a presidential candidate not appear at the convention but accept his nomination in a ceremony several weeks later. Franklin D. Roosevelt was the first major party candidate to break this tradition when in 1932 he delivered his acceptance speech in person before the Democratic convention. Twelve years later, Thomas E. Dewey became the first Republican nominee to give his acceptance speech to the convention. Since then, the final activity of every Democratic and Republican convention has been the delivery of the acceptance speech by the presidential nominee.

Party leaders have also, in recent years, streamlined the schedule, with the assumption that the interest level of most of the viewing public for politics is limited. The result has been shorter speeches and generally fewer roll calls than at those conventions in the pretelevision era. At both conventions in 2008, the address of the vice-presidential candidate was delivered on the night before that of the presidential nominee.

Party leaders desire to put on a good show for the viewing public with the hope of winning votes for their party in November. The convention is a showcase, designed to present the party as both a model of democracy and an

HIGHLIGHTS OF NATIONAL PARTY CONVENTIONS, 1831–2008

- 1831 First national political convention held in Baltimore by Anti-Masonic Party.
- 1832 Democratic Party met in Baltimore for its first national convention.
- 1839 Whig Party held its first national convention.
- 1840 Democrats set up committee to select vice-presidential nominees, subject to approval of convention.
- 1844 Democrats nominated James K. Polk—first “dark-horse” candidate—after nine ballots. Silas Wright declined the vice-presidential nomination. First time a convention nominee refused nomination.
- 1848 Democrats established continuing committee, known as “Democratic National Committee.”
- 1852 Democrats and Whigs both adopted platforms before nominating candidates for president, setting precedent followed almost uniformly ever since.
- 1856 First Republican national convention held in Philadelphia.
- 1860 Democrats met in Charleston, S.C. After ten days and deadlocked on a presidential nominee, delegates adjourned and reconvened in Baltimore. Benjamin Fitzpatrick, the Democrats’ choice for vice president, became the first candidate to withdraw after convention adjournment and be replaced by a selection of the national committee.
First Republican credentials dispute took place over seating delegates from slave states and voting strength of delegates from states where party was comparatively weak.
- 1864 In attempt to close ranks during Civil War, Republicans used the name “Union Party” at convention.
- 1868 For the first time, Republicans gave a candidate (Ulysses S. Grant) 100 percent of vote on first ballot.
A letter from Susan B. Anthony was read before Democratic convention urging support of women’s suffrage.
- 1872 Victoria Claflin Woodhull, nominated by the Equal Rights Party, was the first woman presidential candidate. African American leader Frederick Douglass was her running mate.
- 1880 Republicans nominated James A. Garfield for president on 36th ballot—party’s all-time record number of ballots.
- 1884 Republican Rep. John Roy Lynch of Mississippi became first black elected temporary chairman of national nominating convention.
- 1888 Frederick Douglass was first black to receive a vote in presidential balloting at a major party political convention (Republican).
- 1900 Each party had one woman delegate.
- 1904 Florida Democrats selected delegates in first-ever presidential primary election.
- 1920 For first time, women attended conventions in significant numbers.
- 1924 Republicans adopted bonus votes for states that went Republican in previous election. GOP convention was first to be broadcast on radio.
John W. Davis was nominated by Democrats on record 103rd ballot.
- 1928 Democrats nominated Gov. Alfred E. Smith of New York for president—first time a Roman Catholic placed on national ticket by a major party.
- 1932 Republicans began tradition of appointing their party leader from House of Representatives as permanent convention chairman.
Democrat Franklin D. Roosevelt became first major party candidate to accept presidential nomination in person.
- 1936 Democratic Party voted to end requirement of two-thirds delegate majority for nomination.
- 1940 Republican convention was first to be televised.
- 1944 Democrats adopted bonus votes for states that went Democratic in previous election.
Thomas E. Dewey became first Republican candidate to accept nomination in person.
- 1948 Democrats began appointing Speaker of the House as permanent chairman. Republicans renominated Dewey—first time GOP renominated a defeated presidential candidate.
- 1952 Adlai E. Stevenson was chosen as Democratic nominee in one of few genuine “drafts” in history.
- 1956 Democrats used party loyalty provision in selecting delegates for first time.
- 1960 Democrats adopted civil rights plank that was strongest in party history.
Republican nominee Richard Nixon was party’s first vice president nominated for president at completion of his term.
- 1964 Sen. Margaret Chase Smith was nominated for presidency at Republican convention—first time a woman placed in nomination by a major party.
- 1968 Democratic Party voted to end unit rule. Outside the Chicago convention, antiwar protests erupt in violence.
- 1980 Democratic delegates were composed of an equal number of men and women.
- 1984 Democrats nominated Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro of New York for vice president—the first woman placed on national ticket by a major party.
- 1996 The Reform Party conducted its first convention in a two-stage process that allowed balloting by mail, electronic mail, or phone.
- 2000 Democrats nominated Sen. Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut for vice president—first time a person of Jewish faith placed on national ticket by a major party.
- 2008 Democrats nominated Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois for president—the first African American placed on national ticket by a major party. Republicans nominated Gov. Sarah Palin of Alaska for vice president—the first woman placed on national ticket by the GOP.

efficient, harmonious body. The schedule of convention activities is drawn up with an eye on the peak evening television viewing hours. There is an attempt to present the party's major selling points—the highly partisan keynote speech, the nominating ballots, and the candidates' acceptance speeches—in prime time. (The effort to broadcast acceptance speeches in prime time has been especially strong since 1972, when Democratic nominee George S. McGovern was forced to wait until nearly 3 a.m. to make his speech.) Conversely, party leaders try to keep evidence of bitter party factionalism—such as explosive credentials and platform battles—out of the peak viewing period.

Both the Republicans and Democrats went to extraordinary lengths to turn their 2000 conventions into tightly scripted, visually appealing television shows. But it seems that the harder the political parties try to win over American audiences, the less they have to show for their efforts. Many TV viewers voted with their remote controls—tuning out the 2000 conventions. By and large, ratings for the three major networks' broadcasts of the conventions have been on a steady decline in recent decades. In 2004 the networks—ABC, CBS, and NBC—opted to broadcast only three hours of each four-day convention. Viewers, however, could tune to cable stations such as CNN, Fox, MSNBC, or C-SPAN to watch full coverage. Public broadcasting also provided additional coverage. A similar pattern continued in 2008, with cable stations and public broadcasting providing more hours of coverage than the one hour per night provided by the three networks.

One interesting scheduling twist came during the Republican convention in 2008, when party leaders opted to tone down the first day of revelry in St. Paul and cut back on the number of hours of convention activity because of a major hurricane headed for the U.S. Gulf Coast.

In the media age the appearance of fairness is important, and in a sense this need to look fair and open has assisted the movement for party reform. Some influential party leaders, skeptical of major reform of the convention, have found resistance difficult in the glare of television.

Before the revolution in the means of transportation and communication, conventions met in relative anonymity. Today conventions are held in all the privacy of a fishbowl, with every action and every rumor closely scrutinized. They have become media events and as such are targets for political demonstrations that can be not only an embarrassment to the party but a security problem as well.

In spite of its difficulties, the convention system has survived. Since the first convention was held nearly two centuries ago, the convention has evolved, changing its form but retaining its variety of functions. Criticism has been leveled at the convention, but no substitute has yet been offered that would nominate a presidential ticket, adopt a party platform, act as the supreme governing body of the party, and serve as a massive campaign rally and propaganda forum. In addition to these functions, a convention is a place where compromise can take place—compromise often mandatory in a major political party that combines varying viewpoints.

Political Party Nominees, 1831–2008

FOLLOWING IS A comprehensive list of major and minor party nominees for president and vice president from 1831, when the first nominating convention was held by the Anti-Masonic Party, to 2008. In many cases, minor parties made only token efforts at a presidential campaign. Often, third-party candidates declined to run after being nominated by the convention, or their names appeared on the ballots in only a few states. In some cases the names of minor candidates did not appear on any state ballots and they received only a scattering of write-in votes, if any.

The basic source for the 1832 to 1972 elections was Joseph Nathan Kane, Facts About the Presidents, 6th ed. (New York: H.W. Wilson Co., 1993). ## 1836 ELECTION

Democratic Party

President: Martin Van Buren, New York

Vice president: Richard Mentor Johnson, Kentucky

Whig Party

President: William Henry Harrison, Hugh Lawson

White, Daniel Webster

Vice president: Francis Granger, John Tyler

The Whigs nominated regional candidates in 1836 hoping that each candidate would carry his region and deny Democrat Van Buren an electoral vote majority. Webster was the Whig candidate in Massachusetts; Harrison in the rest of New England, the Middle Atlantic states, and the West; and White in the South.

Granger was the running mate of Harrison and Webster.

Tyler was White's running mate.

1840 ELECTION

Whig Party

President: William Henry Harrison, Ohio

Vice president: John Tyler, Virginia

Democratic Party

President: Martin Van Buren, New York

The Democratic convention adopted a resolution that left the choice of vice-presidential candidates to the states. Democratic electors divided their vice-presidential votes among incumbent Richard M. Johnson (forty-eight votes), Littleton W. Tazewell (eleven votes), and James K. Polk (one vote).

NOTES

* Candidates appeared in Joseph Nathan Kane, Facts About the Presidents, 4th ed. (New York: H.W. Wilson, 1981), but could not be verified in another source.

1. 1912: Arthur M. Schlesinger's History of American Presidential Elections (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1971) lists the Socialist Labor Party vice-presidential candidate as Francis. No first name is given.

2. 1924: Richard M. Scammon's America at the Polls (Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1965) lists the American Party vice-presidential candidate as Leander L. Pickett.

3. 1928: America at the Polls lists the Farmer Labor Party vice-presidential candidate as L.R. Tillman.

4. 1976: McCarthy, who ran as an independent with no party designation, had no national running mate, favoring the elimination of the office. But as various state laws required a running mate, he had different ones in different states, amounting to nearly two dozen, all political unknowns.

5. 1980: In several cases vice-presidential nominees were different from those listed for most states, and the Socialist Workers and American Party nominees for president varied from state to state. For example, because Pulley, the major standard-bearer for the Socialist Workers Party was only twenty-nine years old, his name was not allowed on the ballot in some states (the Constitution requires presidential candidates to be at least thirty-five years old). Hence, the party ran other candidates in those states. In a number of states, candidates appeared on the ballot with variants of the party designations listed, without any party designation, or with entirely different party names.

6. 1984: Both Larry Holmes and Gavrielle Holmes were standard-bearers of the Workers World Party. Of the two, Larry Holmes was listed on more state ballots. Milton Vera was Gavrielle Holmes's vice-presidential running mate in Ohio and Rhode Island. The Workers League Party had three vice-presidential candidates: Jean T. Brust in Illinois; Helen Halyard in Michigan, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania; and Edward Bergonzi in Minnesota and Ohio.

7. 1988: The candidates listed include all those who appeared on the ballot in at least one state. In some cases, a party's vice-presidential candidate varied from state to state. Candidates' full names and states were not available from some parties.

8. 1992: The candidates listed include all those who appeared on the ballot in at least one state. In some cases a party's vice-presidential candidate varied from state to state. Candidates' states were not available from some parties.

9. 1996: The candidates listed include all those who appeared on the ballot in at least one state. In some cases a party's vice-presidential candidate varied from state to state. Candidates' states were not available from some parties.

10. 2000: L. Neil Smith ran as the Libertarian Party's presidential candidate in Arizona only. Harry Browne ran as the party's candidate in the other forty-nine states.

11. 2004: The candidates listed include all those who appeared on the ballot in at least one state. In many states various third-party candidates appeared on the ballot with variations of the party designations, were carried with entirely different party labels, or were listed as "Independent."

12. 2008: The candidates listed include all those who appeared on the ballot in at least one state. In some states third-party candidates appeared on the ballot with variations of the party designations, were carried with entirely different party labels, or were listed as "Independent."

Convention Chronology, 1831–2008

THIS CHAPTER contains brief descriptions of all presidential nominating conventions of major U.S. political parties and excerpts from party platforms. The chronology begins in 1831, when the Anti-Masonic Party held the first nominating convention in American history, and concludes with the national conventions of the Republican and Democratic parties in 2008.

The narrative includes conventions for all parties receiving at least 2 percent of the popular vote in the presidential election. Thus, conventions for the Socialist Party, which received at least 2 percent of the presidential popular vote in 1904, 1908, 1912, 1920, and 1932, are included. Socialist Party conventions for other presidential election years, when the party received less than 2 percent of the popular vote, do not appear. In 2000 the Green Party received 2.7 percent of the popular vote, so its convention is included here.

The sources most frequently consulted in preparing the narrative were Richard C. Bain and Judith H. Parris, Convention Decisions and Voting Records, (Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution, 1973); and various issues of the CQ Weekly.

Ballot Vote Totals

Throughout the narrative, vote totals appear for significant ballots on platform disputes and procedural issues and for presidential and vice-presidential balloting.

The source used for 1835–1972 vote totals was Convention Decisions and Voting Records. The sources for the 1976 through 2004 vote totals were The Official Proceedings of the Democratic National Convention and the Republican National Committee. Charts showing state-by-state voting on selected ballots appear in Chapter 15, Key Convention Ballots, pages 680–751. (For details on these charts, see p. 679.)

Platform Excerpts

The source for the party platform excerpts that appear in the convention chronology was Kirk H. Porter and Donald Bruce Johnson, National Party Platforms, 1840–1972 (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1973). For the Democratic and Republican platform excerpts for 1976 to 2004, the official texts of the platforms adopted by the two parties were used.

In adopting the material from National Party Platforms, 1840–1972, CQ Press has added boldface subheadings to highlight the organization of the texts. For example, excerpts from the 1844 Democratic Party platform appear on page 530. The boldface headings—Appeal to the Masses, Internal Improvements, Government Spending, etc.—do not appear in the text of the party platform as it was published in National Party Platforms, 1840–1972. In all other respects, CQ Press has followed the style and typography of the platform texts appearing in National Party Platforms, 1840–1972. In excerpting the material from the Democratic and Republican platforms from 1976 to 2008, CQ Press has also edited the boldface subheadings from the original platform documents.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Anti-Mason

Henry Clay
National Republican

Andrew Jackson

Anti-Masons

In September 1831 the Anti-Masonic Party held the first national nominating convention in American history. Thirteen states, none south of Maryland, sent 116 delegates to the gathering in Baltimore. They selected the party's presidential and vice-presidential candidates, adopted an address to the people (a precursor of the party platform), and established a national corresponding committee that created the framework for a national campaign organization.

Ironically, the Anti-Masons, whose keystone was opposition to Masonry, nominated a former Mason, William Wirt of Maryland, as their presidential standard-bearer. In spite of a rule requiring a three-fourths nominating majority, Wirt was an easy first-ballot winner and the nearly unanimous nominee of the convention.

He was not, however, the first choice of party leaders, who had been rebuffed in their earlier efforts to persuade Henry Clay and later Supreme Court justice John McLean to take the presidential nomination. Wirt himself was not an enthusiastic candidate, stating that he saw nothing repugnant about Masonry and that if his views did not suit the convention, he would willingly withdraw from the ticket. The delegates supported Wirt and chose Amos Ellmaker of Pennsylvania as his vice-presidential running mate.

National Republicans

In December 1831 the National Republicans held a national convention in Baltimore. The National Republicans were united primarily in their opposition to incumbent President Andrew Jackson. The idea of a convention had been proposed by an anti-Jackson committee in New York City and approved by the leading National Republican newspaper, the National Intelligencer. There was no uniform method of delegate selection, with state conventions, legislative caucuses, and local meetings all being used.

Eighteen states sent 168 delegates to the National Republican convention, although nearly one-quarter were late in arriving due to inclement winter weather. Without any preestablished rules, it was agreed that the roll calls would be taken by announcing each delegate's name. Henry Clay of Kentucky was the convention's unanimous choice for president, and former representative John Sergeant of Pennsylvania was selected without opposition for vice president. Letters accepting their nominations were received from both candidates.

There was no formal platform, although the convention adopted an address to the people that criticized Jackson for dividing a previously harmonious country.

In May 1832 a convention of young National Republicans met in Washington, D.C., and passed a series of resolutions calling for a protective tariff, federal support of internal improvements, and recognition of the Supreme Court as the ultimate authority on constitutional questions. The last was a rebuke of Jackson for disregarding Supreme Court decisions concerning the Cherokee. Other resolutions criticized Jackson's use of the spoils system in distributing patronage and his handling of foreign policy with Great Britain. Although not a formal platform, the resolutions adopted by the convention of young National Republicans were the most definitive discussion of issues during the 1832 campaign.

Democrats

The Democrats held their first national convention in Baltimore in late May 1832. Representatives from twenty-three states attended. The call for a Democratic national convention had been made by Jacksonian members of the New Hampshire legislature, and their proposal was approved by prominent members of President Andrew Jackson's administration. The convention was called to order by a member of the New Hampshire legislature, who explained the intent of the gathering in these words:

... [The] object of the people of New Hampshire who called this convention was, not to impose on the people, as candidates for either of the two first offices of the government, any local favorite; but to concentrate the opinions of all the states.... They believed that the example of this convention would operate favorably in future elections; that the people would be disposed, after seeing the good effects of this convention in conciliating the different and distant sections of the country, to continue this mode of nomination. (Reprinted from Convention Decisions and Voting Records, by Richard C. Bain, p. 17.)

The convention adopted two rules that Democratic conventions retained well into the twentieth century. One based each state's convention vote on its electoral vote, an apportionment method unchanged until 1940.

A second rule established a two-thirds nominating majority, a controversial measure that remained a feature of Democratic conventions until 1936. The 1832 convention also adopted the procedure of having one person from each delegation announce the vote of his state.

The delegates did not formally nominate Jackson for the presidency. Instead they concurred in the various nominations he had received earlier from state legislatures. Jackson's choice for vice president, Martin Van Buren of New York, was easily nominated on the first ballot, receiving 208 of the 283 votes cast.

Instead of adopting a platform or address to the people, the convention decided that each state delegation should write its own report to its constituents. The convention also determined to establish in each state general corresponding committees that together would provide a nationwide organization for the campaign.

Democrats

The Democrats held their second national convention in Baltimore in May 1835. The early date had been set by President Andrew Jackson to prevent the emergence of opposition to his handpicked successor, Vice President Martin Van Buren. Delegates from twenty-two states and two territories attended, and the size of the delegations was generally related to their distance from Baltimore. Maryland sent 188 individuals to cast the state's 10 votes, but only one person attended from Tennessee—a visiting businessman who cast 15 votes. Alabama, Illinois, and South Carolina were unrepresented.

Two rival Pennsylvania delegations arrived, precipitating the first credentials dispute in convention history. It was decided to seat both delegations and let them share the Pennsylvania vote.

An effort to eliminate the rule requiring a two-thirds nominating majority initially passed by a margin of 231 to 210 (apparently counting individual delegates instead of state convention votes), but the two-thirds rule was reimposed by a voice vote. A question developed whether the nominating majority should be based on only the states represented or on all the states in the union. It was decided to base the majority on only those present.

Vice President Van Buren won the presidential nomination, winning all 265 votes. Richard M. Johnson of Kentucky barely reached the necessary two-thirds majority on the first vice-presidential ballot, receiving 178 votes, just one vote more than the required minimum. (Table, p. 680.)

Johnson, known as the alleged slayer of the Native American chief Tecumseh, had aroused some disapproval because of his personal life. Johnson had lived with a mixed-race mistress by whom he had two daughters.

Once again the Democrats did not write a formal platform, although an address to the people was published in the party newspaper, the Washington Globe. Van Buren wrote a letter of acceptance in which he promised to “tread generally in the footsteps of President Jackson.”

Whigs

During Jackson's second term, a new party, the Whigs, emerged as the Democrats' primary opposition. It contained remnants of the short-lived National Republican Party, as well as anti-Jackson elements in the Democratic and Anti-Masonic parties. Although the Whigs were a rising political force, the party lacked national cohesion in 1836. Instead of holding a convention and nominating national candidates, the Whigs ran regional candidates nominated by state legislatures. It was the hope of Whig strategists that the regional candidates would receive enough electoral votes to throw the election into the House of Representatives, where the party could unite behind the leading prospect.

Sen. Daniel Webster of New Hampshire ran as the Whig candidate in Massachusetts; Sen. Hugh L. White of Tennessee was the party standard-bearer in the South; Gen. William Henry Harrison of Ohio was the Whig candidate in the rest of the country. The Whigs chose Francis Granger of New York as Harrison and Webster's running mate and John Tyler of Virginia to run with White.

Whigs

By 1839 the Whigs had established themselves as a powerful opposition party, unified enough to run a national candidate against the Democratic president, Martin Van Buren. The call for the Whigs' first national convention was issued by a group of party members in Congress. Nearly 250 delegates responded, gathering in Harrisburg, Pa., in December 1839.

Three candidates were in contention for the presidential nomination: Gens. William Henry Harrison of Ohio and Winfield Scott of Virginia and Sen. Henry Clay of Kentucky. After long debate, it was decided that each state would ballot separately, then select representatives who would meet and discuss the views and results of their delegation meetings with representatives of the other states. The unit rule would be in effect, binding the entire vote of each state to the candidate who received a majority of the state's delegates.

The nominating rules agreed to by the convention strongly favored the forces opposed to Clay. First, they negated substantial Clay strength in state delegations in which he did not hold a majority of the vote. Second, they permitted balloting in relative anonymity, so that delegates would be more likely to defect from the popular Kentuckian than they would if the balloting were public.

Clay led on the first ballot, but switches by Scott delegates on subsequent roll calls gave the nomination to Harrison. On the final ballot, Harrison received 148 votes to 90 for Clay and 16 for Scott. Harrison's vote was short of a two-thirds majority, but under Whig rules only a simple majority was needed to nominate.

To give the ticket factional and geographic balance, a friend of Clay, former Democrat John Tyler of Virginia, was the unanimous selection for vice president. The convention did not risk destruction of the tenuous unity of its anti-Democratic coalition by adopting a party platform or statement of principles.

Democrats

In May 1840 the Democrats held their national convention in Baltimore. The call once again was initiated by members of the New Hampshire Legislature. Delegates from twenty-one states attended, while five states were unrepresented. Again, the size of the state delegations was largely determined by their distance from Baltimore. New Jersey sent fifty-nine people to cast the state's eight votes, while only one delegate came from Massachusetts to decide that state's fourteen votes.

To avoid a bitter dispute over the vice-presidential nomination, the convention appointed a committee to recommend nominees for both spots on the ticket. The committee's recommendation that Van Buren be renominated for president was passed by acclamation. On the touchier problem of the vice presidency, the committee recommended that no nomination be made, a suggestion that was also agreed to by the convention. Dissatisfaction with the personal life of Vice President Johnson had increased, leading to the decision that state Democratic leaders determine who would run as the vice-presidential candidate in their own states.

Before the nominating process had begun, the convention had approved the first party platform in American history. A platform committee was appointed "to prepare resolutions declaratory of the principles of the ... party." The committee report was approved without discussion.

The first Democratic platform was a short document, fewer than 1,000 words long. Although brief by modern standards, the platform clearly emphasized the party's belief in a strict reading of the Constitution. It began by stating "that the federal government is one of limited powers" and spelled out in detail what the federal government could not do. The platform stated that the federal government did not have the power to finance internal improvements, assume state debts, charter a national bank, or interfere with the rights of the states, especially relating to slavery. The platform criticized the abolitionists for stirring up the explosive slavery question. The Democrats urged the government to practice economy, supported President Van Buren's independent treasury plan, and affirmed their belief in the principles expressed in the Declaration of Independence.

In addition to the platform, the convention adopted an address to the people, which was written by a separate committee. Much longer than the platform, the address discussed party principles, lauded Van Buren and Jackson for following these principles and warned of dire consequences if the opposition should be elected.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1840:

Strict Construction. That the federal government is one of limited powers, derived solely from the constitution, and the grants of power shown therein, ought to be strictly construed by all the departments and agents of the government, and that it is inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful constitutional powers.

Internal Improvements. That the constitution does not confer upon the general government the power to commence and carry on, a general system of internal improvements.

State Debts. That the constitution does not confer authority upon the federal government, directly or indirectly, to assume the debts of the several states, contracted for local internal improvements, or other state purposes; nor would such assumption be just or expedient.

Equality of Rights. That justice and sound policy forbid the federal government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another, or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country—that every citizen and every section of the country, has a right to demand and insist upon an equality of rights and privileges, and to complete and ample protection of person and property from domestic violence, or foreign aggression.

Government Spending. That it is the duty of every branch of the government, to enforce and practice the most rigid economy, in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised, than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the government.

National Bank. That congress has no power to charter a national bank; that we believe such an institution one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power, and above the laws and the will of the people.

States' Rights, Slavery. That congress has no power, under the constitution, to interfere with or control the domestic institutions of the several states, and that such states are the sole and proper judges of everything appertaining to their own affairs, not prohibited by the constitution; that all efforts by abolitionists or others, made to induce congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto, are calculated to lead to the most alarming and dangerous consequences, and that all such efforts have an inevitable tendency to diminish the happiness of the people, and endanger the stability and permanency of the union, and ought not to be countenanced by any friend to our political institutions.

Independent Treasury. That the separation of the moneys of the government from banking institutions, is indispensable for the safety of the funds of the government, and the rights of the people.

Democratic Principles. That the liberal principles embodied by Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence, and sanctioned in the constitution, which makes ours the land of liberty, and the asylum of the oppressed of every nation, have ever been cardinal principles in the democratic faith; and every attempt to abridge the present privilege of becoming citizens, and the owners of soil among us, ought to be resisted with the same spirit which swept the alien and sedition laws from our statute-book.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

James G. Birney
Liberty

Henry Clay
Whig

James K. Polk

Liberty Party

The Liberty Party held its second national convention in Buffalo, N.Y., in August 1843. The party, born of the failure of the Whigs and the Democrats to make a strong appeal to abolitionist voters, had held its first national convention in April 1840 in Albany, N.Y. James G. Birney of Michigan, a former slave owner, was nominated for president and Thomas Earle of Ohio was chosen as his running mate. In the 1840 election the party polled 0.29 percent of the national popular vote.

At the 1843 convention, 148 delegates from twelve states assembled in Buffalo and renominated Birney for the presidency and chose Thomas Morris of Ohio as his running mate. The party platform was more than 3,000 words long, the lengthiest platform written by any party in the nineteenth century. In spite of its length, the platform discussed only one issue, slavery. In the 1844 election, the party received 2.3 percent of the national popular vote, its highest total in any presidential election. By 1848, most members of the party joined the newly formed Free Soil Party.

Following are excerpts from the Liberty Party platform of 1844:

Resolved, That the Liberty party ... will demand the absolute and unqualified divorce of the General Government from Slavery, and also the restoration of equality of rights, among men, in every State where the party exists, or may exist.

Therefore, Resolved, That we hereby give it to be distinctly understood, by this nation and the world, that, as abolitionists, considering that the strength of our cause lies in its righteousness—and our hope for it in our conformity to the LAWS of GOD, and our respect for the RIGHTS OF MAN, we owe it to the Sovereign Ruler of the Universe, as a proof of our allegiance to Him, in all our civil relations and offices, whether as private citizens, or as public functionaries sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, to regard and to treat the third clause of the second section of the fourth article of that instrument, whenever applied to the case of a fugitive slave, as utterly null and void, and consequently as forming no part of the Constitution of the United States, whenever we are called upon, or sworn, to support it.

Whigs

In a harmonious one-day session, the Whigs' national convention nominated for the presidency the party's former leader in Congress, Henry Clay. It was a final rebuff for President John Tyler from the party that had nominated him for the second spot on its ticket in 1840. Three years of bickering between the White House and Whig leaders in Congress had made Tyler, former Democrat, persona non grata in the Whig Party.

Delegates from every state were represented at the Whig convention, held in Baltimore on May 1, 1844. Clay was the unanimous nominee, and it was proposed that he be invited to address the convention the next day. However, the Kentuckian declined this opportunity to make the first acceptance speech in U.S. political history, stating in a letter that he was unable to reconcile an appearance with his “sense of delicacy and propriety.” (Table, p. 681.)

Three potential candidates for the vice presidency sent letters of withdrawal before balloting for second place on the ticket began. Unlike the convention four years earlier, the Whigs abandoned their relatively secret state caucus method of voting and adopted a public roll call, with the chair calling the name of each delegate. Theodore Frelinghuysen of New Jersey won a plurality of the convention vote for vice president on the first ballot and went on to gain, on the third ballot, the required majority.

After the nominations, several resolutions were adopted, including one that defined Whig principles and served as the party’s first platform. It was a brief document, fewer than 100 words long, and the only clear difference between it and the platform adopted later by the Democratic convention was on the issue of distributing proceeds from the sale of public land. The Whigs favored distribution of these revenues to the states; the Democrats opposed it believing the proceeds should be retained by the federal government. In a continued reaction to the Jackson administration, the Whigs criticized “executive usurpations” and proposed a single-term presidency. The rest of the Whig platform called for government efficiency, “a well-regulated currency,” a tariff for revenue, and the protection of American labor.

Westward territorial expansion, particularly the annexation of Texas, was not mentioned in the Whig platform, but it was an explosive issue by 1844 that made a significant impact on the Democratic convention.

Following is an excerpt from the Whig platform of 1844:

Resolved, That these principles may be summed as comprising, a well-regulated currency; a tariff for revenue to defray the necessary expenses of the government, and discriminating with special reference to protection of the domestic labor of the country; the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; a single term for the presidency; a reform of executive usurpations;—and, generally—such an administration of the affairs of the country as shall impart to every branch of the public service the greatest practicable efficiency, controlled by a well regulated and wise economy.

Democrats

Delegates from every state except South Carolina assembled in Baltimore in late May 1844 for the Democratic convention. The front-runner for the presidential nomination was former president Martin Van Buren, whose status was threatened on the eve of the convention by his statement against the annexation of Texas. Van Buren’s position jeopardized his support in the South, and with a two-thirds majority apparently necessary, dimmed his chances of obtaining the presidential nomination. The question of requiring a two-thirds nominating majority was debated in the early sessions of the convention, and by a vote of 148 to 118 the two-thirds majority rule, initially adopted by the party in 1832, was ratified. (Table, p. 680.)

Van Buren led the early presidential balloting, actually receiving a simple majority of the vote on the first ballot. On succeeding roll calls, however, his principal opponent, Lewis Cass of Michigan, gained strength and took the lead. But neither candidate approached the 178 votes needed for nomination.

With a deadlock developing, sentiment for a compromise candidate appeared. James K. Polk, former speaker of the Tennessee House and former governor of Tennessee, emerged as an acceptable choice and won the nomination on the ninth ballot. It marked the first time in American history that a dark-horse candidate won a presidential nomination. (Table, p. 680.)

A friend of Van Buren, Sen. Silas Wright of New York, was the nearly unanimous nominee of the convention for vice president. But Wright refused the nomination, quickly notifying the delegates by way of Samuel Morse’s new invention, the telegraph. After two more ballots, George M. Dallas of Pennsylvania was chosen as Polk’s running mate.

Among its final actions, the convention appointed a central committee and recommended that a nationwide party organization be established—a forerunner of the national committee. The delegates did not adopt a platform but appointed a committee to draft resolutions.

The resulting document contained the same resolutions included in the party’s 1840 platform, plus several new planks. The Democrats opposed the distribution of the proceeds from the sale of public lands; were against placing any restrictions on the executive veto power; and, to alleviate the sectional bitterness aroused by the prospect of western expansion, recommended the annexation of both Texas and Oregon.

President Tyler, although abandoned by the major parties, wanted to remain in office. Friends and federal officeholders gathered in Baltimore at the same time as the Democrats and nominated Tyler. However, it became apparent that the president’s national vote-getting appeal was limited, and he withdrew from the race in favor of the Democrat, Polk.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic resolutions of 1844:

Appeal to the Masses. That the American Democracy place their trust, not in factitious symbols, not in displays and appeals insulting to the judgment and subversive of the intellect of the people, but in a clear reliance upon the intelligence, patriotism, and the discriminating justice of the American masses.

That we regard this as a distinctive feature of our political creed, which we are proud to maintain before the world, as the great moral element in a form of government springing from and upheld by the popular will; and we contrast it with the creed and practice of Federalism, under whatever name or form, which seeks to palsy the will of the constituent, and which conceives no imposture too monstrous for the popular credulity.

Internal Improvements. That the Constitution does not confer upon the General Government the power to commence or carry on a general system of internal improvements.

State Debts. That the Constitution does not confer authority upon the Federal Government, directly or indirectly, to assume the debts of the several states.

Government Spending. That it is the duty of every branch of the government to enforce and practice the most rigid economy in conducting our public affairs, and that no more revenue ought to be raised than is required to defray the necessary expenses of the government.

National Bank. That Congress has no power to charter a United States Bank, that we believe such an institution one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and the liberties of the people.

States' Rights. That Congress has no power, under the Constitution, to interfere with or control the domestic institutions of the several States; and that such States are the sole and proper judges of everything pertaining to their own affairs, not prohibited by the Constitution; that all efforts, by abolitionists or others, made to induce Congress to interfere with questions of slavery, or to take incipient steps in relation thereto, are calculated to lead to the most alarming and dangerous consequences.

Public Lands. That the proceeds of the Public Lands ought to be sacredly applied to the national objects specified in the Constitution, and that we are opposed to the laws lately adopted, and to any law for the distribution of such proceeds among the States, as alike inexpedient in policy and repugnant to the Constitution.

Executive Veto Power. That we are decidedly opposed to taking from the President the qualified veto power by which he is enabled, under restrictions and responsibilities amply sufficient to guard the public interest.

Western Expansion. That our title to the whole of the Territory of Oregon is clear and unquestionable; that no portion of the same ought to be ceded to England or any other power, and that the reoccupation of Oregon and the reannexation of Texas at the earliest practicable period are great American measures, which this Convention recommends to the cordial support of the Democracy of the Union.

Democrats

Delegates from every state gathered in Baltimore in May 1848 for the Democratic Party's fifth national convention.

A seating dispute between two rival New York delegations enlivened the early convention sessions. The conflict reflected a factional fight between a more liberal antislavery faction, known as the Barnburners, and a more conservative faction, known as the Hunkers. By a vote of 126 to 125, the convention adopted a compromise by which both delegations were seated and shared New York's vote. However, this compromise satisfied neither of the contesting delegations. The Barnburners bolted the convention. The Hunkers remained but refused to vote. (Table, p. 681.)

Before the presidential balloting could begin, the convention had to decide whether to use the controversial two-thirds rule. Consideration of the rule preceded the credentials controversy, which brought an objection from New York delegates who wanted their seating dispute settled first. But, by a vote of 133 to 121, the convention refused to table the issue. A second vote on adoption of the two-thirds rule was approved, 176 to 78. (Table, p. 681.)

The front-runner for the presidential nomination was Sen. Lewis Cass of Michigan. Although Cass was from the North, his view that the existence of slavery in the territories should be determined by their inhabitants (a forerunner of Stephen Douglas's "popular sovereignty") was a position acceptable to the South.

Cass received 125 votes on the first ballot, more than double the total of his two principal rivals, James Buchanan of Pennsylvania and Levi Woodbury of New Hampshire. Cass's vote total steadily increased during the next three roll calls, and on the fourth ballot he received 179 votes and was nominated. His vote was actually short of a two-thirds majority of the allotted convention votes, but the chair ruled that, with New York not voting, the required majority was reduced. (Table, p. 681.)

The vice-presidential nomination went on the second ballot to Gen. William O. Butler of Kentucky, who had 169 of the 253 votes cast. As in the earlier presidential balloting, Butler's two-thirds majority was based on votes cast rather than votes allotted. Butler's primary rival for the nomination was a military colleague, Gen. John A. Quitman of Mississippi.

One of the most significant acts of the convention was the formation of a national committee, with one member from each state, that would handle party affairs until the next convention four years later.

As in 1840 and 1844, the heart of the Democratic platform was a series of resolutions describing the party's concept of a federal government with limited powers. New resolutions emphasized Democratic opposition to a national bank and the distribution of land sales to the states, while applauding the independent treasury plan, the lower tariff bill passed in 1846, and the successful war against Mexico. An effort by William L. Yancey of Alabama to insert in the platform a plank on slavery that would prevent interference with the rights of slaveholders in states or territories was defeated, 216 to 36. The slavery plank written in the platform had the same wording as earlier versions in the 1840 and 1844 Democratic platforms. The plank was milder than Yancey's proposal, stating simply that Congress did not have the power to interfere with slavery in the states. The convention adopted the complete platform by a vote of 247 to 0.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1848:

Mexican War. That the war with Mexico, provoked on her part by years of insult and injury, was commenced by her army crossing the Rio Grande, attacking the American troops, and invading our sister State of Texas; and that, upon all the principles of patriotism and laws of nations, it is a just and necessary war on our part, in which every American citizen should have shown himself on the side of his country, and neither morally nor physically, by word or by deed, have given "aid and comfort to the enemy."

Democratic Accomplishments. That the fruits of the great political triumph of 1844, which elected James K. Polk and George M. Dallas President and Vice President of the United States, have fulfilled the hopes of the Democracy of the Union—in defeating the declared purposes of their opponents to create a national bank; in preventing the corrupt and unconstitutional distribution of the land proceeds, from the common treasury of the Union, for local purposes; in protecting the currency and the labor of the country from ruinous fluctuations, and guarding the money of the people for the use of the people, by the establishment of the constitutional treasury; in the noble impulse given to the cause of free trade, by the repeal of the tariff in 1842 and the creation of the more equal, honest, and productive tariff of 1846.

Whigs

Whig delegates from every state except Texas gathered in Philadelphia in June 1848. Although the Lone Star state was unrepresented, a Texas Whig state convention had earlier given a proxy for its votes to the Louisiana delegates. There was debate in the convention about the legality of the proxy, but it was ultimately accepted by the delegates.

The battle for the Whig's presidential nomination involved three major contenders, the party's respected aging statesman, Henry Clay of Kentucky; and two generals—Zachary Taylor and Winfield Scott, both of Virginia—whose political appeal was significantly increased by their military exploits in the recently completed Mexican War. Taylor led throughout the balloting, taking the lead on the first ballot with 111 votes, compared with 97 for Clay and 43 for Scott. Taylor increased his lead on subsequent roll calls, winning the nomination on the fourth ballot with 171 of the 280 votes cast. (Table, p. 682.)

Millard Fillmore of New York and Abbott Lawrence of Massachusetts were the prime contenders for the vice-presidential nomination. Fillmore led Lawrence, 115 to 109, on the first ballot and pulled away to win on the second ballot with 173 of the 266 votes cast.

A motion to make the presidential and vice-presidential nominations unanimous failed when several delegates objected, doubting Taylor's support of Whig principles.

The Whig convention did not formally adopt a party platform, although a ratification meeting held in Philadelphia after the convention adopted a series of resolutions. The resolutions avoided a discussion of issues, instead lauding the party's presidential nominee, Zachary Taylor, and affirming his faithfulness to the tenets of the party.

Free Soilers

Antislavery Whigs, New York Barnburners, and members of the Liberty Party gathered in Buffalo, N.Y., in August 1848 to form a new third party, the Free Soilers. While opposition to slavery was a common denominator of the various elements in the new party, the dissident Democrats and Whigs also were attracted to the Free Soil Party by the lack of influence they exerted in their former parties. The call for a Free Soil convention was made by the New York Barnburners at their state conclave in June 1848 and by a non-partisan gathering in Columbus, Ohio, the same month. The latter assembly, organized by Salmon P. Chase, was entitled a People's Convention of Friends of Free Territory and was designed to set the stage for a national Free Soil convention.

Eighteen states (including the slave states of Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia) sent 465 delegates to Buffalo for the birth of the Free Soil Party. Because of the large number of delegates, convention leaders determined that delegates from each state would select several members to form a Committee on Conference, which would conduct convention business. The rest of the delegates would sit in a large tent and listen to campaign oratory.

Martin Van Buren, the former Democratic president and a favorite of the Barnburners, was chosen as the new party's standard-bearer on the first ballot. Van Buren received 244 votes to defeat John P. Hale of New Hampshire, who had 181 votes. Hale had been nominated by the Liberty Party in October 1847, but with Van Buren's nomination he withdrew from the race. The vice-presidential nomination went to a former Whig, Charles Francis Adams of Massachusetts.

While the Free Soil platform opposed the extension of slavery into the territories, the party did not feel the federal government had the power to interfere with slavery in the states. Although this position was significantly stronger than the position adopted by the Democrats, it was milder than the all-out opposition to slavery expressed by the Liberty Party four years earlier. The Free Soilers also adopted positions on a variety of other issues, supporting free land for settlers, a tariff for revenue purposes, cheap postage, and federal spending for river and harbor improvements.

Basically, the Free Soil platform expressed belief in a federal government with broader powers than that conceived by the Democrats.

Following are excerpts from the Free Soil Party platform of 1848:

Slavery. That Slavery in the several States of this Union which recognize its existence, depends upon the State laws alone, which cannot be repealed or modified by the Federal Government, and for which laws that Government is not responsible. We therefore propose no interference by Congress with Slavery within the limits of any State.

Resolved, THAT IT IS THE DUTY OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO RELIEVE ITSELF FROM ALL RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE EXISTENCE OR CONTINUANCE OF SLAVERY WHEREVER THAT GOVERNMENT POSSESS CONSTITUTIONAL POWER TO LEGISLATE ON THAT SUBJECT, AND IS THUS RESPONSIBLE FOR ITS EXISTENCE.

Resolved, That the true, and, in the judgment of this Convention, the only safe means of preventing the extension of Slavery into territory now free, is to prohibit its existence in all such territory by an act of Congress.

Government Administration. That we demand CHEAP POSTAGE for the people; a retrenchment of the expenses and patronage of the Federal Government; the abolition of all unnecessary offices and salaries; and the election by the People of all civil officers in the service of the Government, so far as the same may be practicable.

Internal Improvements. That river and harbor improvements, when demanded by the safety and convenience of commerce with foreign nations, or among the several States, are objects of national concern; and that it is the duty of Congress, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, to provide therefor.

Homesteading. That the FREE GRANT TO ACTUAL SETTLERS, in consideration of the expenses they incur in making settlements in the wilderness, which are usually fully equal to their actual cost, and of the public benefits resulting therefrom, of reasonable portions of the public lands, under suitable limitations, is a wise and just measure of public policy, which will promote, in various ways, the interest of all the States of this Union; and we therefore recommend it to the favorable consideration of the American People.

Tariff. That the obligations of honor and patriotism require the earliest practical payment of the national debt, and we are therefore in favor of such a tariff of duties as will raise revenue adequate to defray the necessary expenses of the Federal Government, and to pay annual installments of our debt and the interest thereon.

Party Motto. Resolved, That we inscribe on our banner, "FREE SOIL, FREE SPEECH, FREE LABOR, AND FREE MEN."

Democrats

In spite of the efforts of the major politicians of both parties, the explosive slavery question was fast becoming the dominant issue in American politics and was threatening the tenuous intersectional alliances that held together both the Democratic and Whig parties. Under the cloud of this volatile issue, the Democratic convention convened in Baltimore in June 1852.

The delegates were called to order by the party's first national chairman, Benjamin F. Hallett of Massachusetts. Hallett's first action was to limit the size of each state delegation to its electoral vote, dispatching members of oversized delegations to the rear of the hall. Retention of the two-thirds rule provoked little opposition, unlike the disputes at the 1844 and 1848 conventions, and an effort to table the rule was soundly beaten, 269 to 13.

With a degree of orderliness, the convention disposed of procedural matters, clearing the way for the presidential balloting. There were four major contenders for the nomination: Sen. Lewis Cass of Michigan, James Buchanan of Pennsylvania, and William L. Marcy of New York—all three more than sixty years old—and the rising young senator from Illinois, Stephen A. Douglas, thirty-nine. Each of the four challengers led at one point during the numerous ballots that followed.

Cass jumped in front initially, receiving 116 votes on the first ballot. Buchanan trailed with 93, while Marcy and Douglas were far back with 27 and 20 votes, respectively. Cass's vote dropped after the first few roll calls, but he was able to hold the lead until the twentieth ballot, when Buchanan moved in front. Buchanan led for several roll calls, followed by Douglas, who edged into the lead on the thirtieth ballot, only to be quickly displaced by Cass on the thirty-second ballot. Marcy made his spurt between the thirty-sixth and forty-eighth ballots, and took the lead on the forty-fifth and forty-sixth ballots. But in spite of the quick changes in fortune, none of the four contenders could win a simple majority of the votes, let alone the two-thirds required. (Table, p. 683.)

With a deadlock developing, on the thirty-fifth ballot the Virginia delegation introduced a new name, Franklin Pierce of New Hampshire. Although formerly a member of both houses of Congress, Pierce was little known nationally and not identified with any party faction. Pierce's relative anonymity made him an acceptable alternative in the volatile convention. Pierce received fifteen votes on the thirty-fifth ballot and gradually gained strength on subsequent ballots, with the big break coming on the forty-ninth roll call. Nearly unanimous votes for Pierce in the New England states created a bandwagon effect that resulted in his nomination on this ballot with 279 of the 288 votes cast. The forty-nine ballots took two days.

Beginning the vice-presidential roll call, a spokesperson for the Maine delegation suggested that second place on the ticket go to a representative of the South, specifically mentioning Sen. William R. King of Alabama. King moved into a strong lead on the first ballot with 125 votes and easily won nomination on the second roll call with 277 of the 288 votes cast.

The platform adopted by the Democratic convention contained the same nine resolutions that had been in all party platforms since 1840, detailing the Democratic concept of a limited federal government. The platform included a plank supporting the Compromise of 1850, the congressional solution to the slavery question. Actually, both the Whigs and Democrats endorsed the compromise of 1850. The major point of dispute between the two parties was over the issue of internal improvements, with the Whigs taking a broader view of federal power in this sphere.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1852:

Compromise of 1850. Resolved, ... the democratic party of the Union, standing on this national platform, will abide by and adhere to a faithful execution of the acts known as the compromise measures settled by the last Congress—"the act for reclaiming fugitives from service or labor" included; which act, being designed to carry out an express provision of the constitution, cannot, with fidelity thereto be repealed nor so changed as to destroy or impair its efficiency.

Resolved, That the democratic party will resist all attempts at renewing, in congress or out of it, the agitation of the slavery question, under whatever shape or color the attempt may be made.

Democratic Principles. That, in view of the condition of popular institutions in the Old World, a high and sacred duty is devolved, with increased responsibility upon the democratic party of this country, as the party of the people, to uphold and maintain the rights of every State, and thereby the Union of the States, and to sustain and advance among us constitutional liberty, by continuing to resist all monopolies and exclusive legislation for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many, and by a vigilant and constant adherence to those principles and compromises of the constitution, which are broad enough and strong enough to embrace and uphold the Union as it was, the Union as it is, and the Union as it shall be, in the full expansion of the energies and capacity of this great and progressive people.

Whigs

Although in control of the White House, the Whigs were more sharply divided by the Compromise of 1850 than were the Democrats. The majority of northern Whigs in Congress opposed the Compromise, while most southern members of the party favored it. Faced with widening division in their ranks, Whig delegates convened in Baltimore in June 1852. The call for this national convention had been issued by Whig members of Congress, and delegates from all thirty-one states attended.

The convention sessions were often lively and sometimes raucous. When asked to present its report the first day, the credentials committee responded that it was not ready to report and "didn't know when—maybe for days." A minister, invited to the hall to deliver a prayer to the convention, never had his chance. The delegates debated when the prayer should be delivered and finally decided to omit it.

A heated debate occurred on how many votes each state would be apportioned on the platform committee. By a vote of 149 to 144, the delegates adopted a plan whereby each state's vote on the committee would reflect its strength in the electoral college. Strong protests from southern and small northern states, however, brought a reversal of this decision, and although no formal vote was recorded, representation on the platform committee was changed so that each state received one vote.

The northern and southern wings of the Whig Party were nearly equally represented at the Baltimore convention, and the close split produced a prolonged battle for the party's presidential nomination. The two major rivals for the nomination, President Millard Fillmore and Winfield Scott, had nearly equal strength. Ironically, the basic appeal of Fillmore of New York was among southern delegates, who appreciated his support of the Compromise of 1850.

Although a native of Virginia, Scott was not popular in the South because of his ambivalence on the Compromise and the active support given him by a leading antislavery northerner, Sen. William H. Seward of New York. Scott's strength was in the northern and western states. A third candidate in the field was Daniel Webster, the party's elder statesman, whose appeal was centered in his native New England.

On the first ballot, Fillmore received 133 votes, Scott had 132, and Webster collected 29. This nearly equal distribution of the vote between Fillmore and Scott continued with little fluctuation through the first two days of balloting. Midway through the second day, after the thirty-fourth ballot, a motion was made to adjourn. Although it was defeated by a vote of 126 to 76, other motions were made to adjourn throughout the rest of the session. Finally, amid increasing confusion, after the forty-sixth ballot, delegates voted by a margin of 176 to 116 to adjourn. (Table, p. 684.)

Commotion continued the next day, with southern delegates trying unsuccessfully to expel Henry J. Raymond, the editor of the New York Times, who was also a delegate by proxy. In an article, Raymond had charged collusion between party managers and southern delegates, with the South getting its way on the platform while Scott received the presidential nomination.

Amid this uproar, the leaders of the Fillmore and Webster forces were negotiating. Fillmore was willing to release his delegates to Webster, if Webster could muster 41 votes on his own. As the balloting continued, it was apparent that Webster could not; and enough delegates defected to Scott to give the Mexican War hero a simple majority and the nomination on the fifty-third ballot. On the final roll call, Scott received 159 votes, compared with 112 for Fillmore, and 21 for Webster.

Several individuals placed in nomination for the vice presidency refused it immediately. The chairman of the convention finally declared Secretary of the Navy William A. Graham of North Carolina to be the unanimous selection. No formal roll-call vote was recorded.

For only the second time in their history, the Whigs adopted a party platform. Like their Democratic adversaries, the Whigs supported the Compromise of 1850 and perceived the federal government as having limited powers. Additional planks called for a tariff on imports to raise revenue and for an isolationist foreign policy that avoided “entangling alliances.” The platform was adopted by a vote of 227 to 66, with all the dissenting votes cast by delegates from the North and West.

Following are excerpts from the Whig platform of 1852:

Strict Construction. The Government of the United States is of a limited character, and it is confined to the exercise of powers expressly granted by the Constitution, and such as may be necessary and proper for carrying the granted powers into full execution, and that all powers not granted or necessarily implied are expressly reserved to the States respectively and to the people.

Foreign Policy. That while struggling freedom everywhere enlists the warmest sympathy of the Whig party, we still adhere to the doctrines of the Father of his Country, as announced in his Farewell Address, of keeping ourselves free from all entangling alliances with foreign countries, and of never quitting our own to stand upon foreign ground, that our mission as a republic is not to propagate our opinions, or impose on other countries our form of government by artifice or force; but to teach, by example, and show by our success, moderation and justice, the blessings of self-government, and the advantages of free institutions.

Tariff. Revenue sufficient for the expenses of an economical administration of the Government in time of peace ought to be derived from a duty on imports, and not from direct taxation.

Internal Improvements. The Constitution vests in Congress the power to open and repair harbors, and remove obstructions from navigable rivers, whenever such improvements are necessary for the common defense, and for the protection and facility of commerce with foreign nations, or among the States, said improvements being, in every instance, national and general in their character.

Compromise of 1850. That the series of acts of the Thirty-first Congress—the act known as the Fugitive Slave Law, included—are received and acquiesced in by the Whig Party of the United States as a settlement in principle and substance, of the dangerous and exciting question which they embrace; and, so far as they are concerned, we will maintain them, and insist upon their strict enforcement, until time and experience shall demonstrate the necessity of further legislation.

Free Democrats (Free Soilers)

After the 1848 election, the New York Barnburners returned to the Democratic Party, and the rest of the Free Soilers were ready to coalesce with either the Democrats or the Whigs. But the process of absorption was delayed by the Compromise of 1850. It was viewed as a solution to the slavery question by the two major parties but was regarded as a sellout by most antislavery groups.

Responding to a call for a national convention issued by a Cleveland, Ohio, antislavery meeting, delegates gathered in Pittsburgh in August 1852. Antislavery Whigs and remnants of the Liberty Party were in attendance at what was termed the Free Soil Democratic Convention.

John P. Hale of New Hampshire unanimously won the presidential nomination, and George W. Julian of Indiana was selected as his running mate.

Although the platform covered a number of issues, the document focused on the slavery question. The Free Soil Democrats opposed the Compromise of 1850 and called for the abolition of slavery. Like both major parties, the Free Democrats expressed the concept of a limited federal government, but they agreed with the Whigs that the government should undertake certain river and harbor improvements. The Free Democrats went beyond the other parties in advocating a homestead policy, extending a welcome to immigrants and voicing support for new republican governments in Europe and the Caribbean.

Following are excerpts from the Free Democratic platform of 1852:

Strict Construction. That the Federal Government is one of limited powers, derived solely from the Constitution, and the grants of power therein ought to be strictly construed by all the departments and agents of the Government, and it is inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful constitutional powers.

Compromise of 1850. That, to the persevering and importunate demands of the slave power for more slave States, new slave Territories, and the nationalization of slavery, our distinct and final answer is—no more slave States, no slave Territory, no nationalized slavery, and no national legislation for the extradition of slaves.

That slavery is a sin against God and a crime against man, which no human enactment nor usage can make right; and that Christianity, humanity, and patriotism, alike demand its abolition.

That the Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 is repugnant to the Constitution, to the principles of the common law, to the spirit of Christianity, and to the sentiments of the civilized world. We therefore deny its binding force upon the American People, and demand its immediate and total repeal.

Homesteading. That the public lands of the United States belong to the people, and should not be sold to individuals nor granted to corporations, but should be held as a sacred trust for the benefit of the people, and should be granted in limited quantities, free of cost, to landless settlers.

Internal Improvements. That river and harbor improvements, when necessary to the safety and convenience of commerce with foreign nations or among the several States, are objects of national concern, and it is the duty of Congress in the exercise of its constitutional powers to provide for the same.

Republicans

With the decline of the Whigs and the increasing importance of the slavery issue, there was room for a new political party. Officially born in 1854, the new Republican Party moved to fill the vacuum.

The party's first meeting was held in Pittsburgh in February 1856, with delegates from twenty-four states attending. United in their opposition to the extension of slavery and the policies of the Pierce administration, the gathering selected a national committee (with one representative from each state), which was empowered to call the party's first national convention.

The subsequent call was addressed not to Republicans but "to the people of the United States" who were opposed to the Pierce administration and the congressional compromises on slavery. Each state was allocated six delegates at the forthcoming convention, with three additional delegates for each congressional district.

When the first Republican National Convention assembled in Philadelphia in June 1856, the gathering was clearly sectional. There were nearly 600 delegates present, representing all the northern states, the border slave states of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, and Kentucky, and the District of Columbia. The territory of Kansas, symbolically important in the slavery struggle, was treated as a state and given full representation. There were no delegations from the remaining southern slave states.

Under convention rules, the roll call was to proceed in alphabetical order, with each state allocated three times its electoral vote. In response to a question, the chair decided that a simple majority would be required and not the two-thirds majority mandated by the Democratic convention. This was an important rule that distinguished the conventions of the two major parties well into the twentieth century.

Two major contenders for the Republican presidential nomination, Salmon P. Chase of Ohio and William H. Seward of New York, both withdrew before the balloting began. Another contender, Supreme Court Justice John McLean of Ohio, withdrew briefly but then reentered the race. However, McLean could not catch the front-runner, John C. Fremont of California. Although briefly a U.S. senator, Fremont was most famous as an explorer, and he benefited from being free of any ideological identification.

The other contenders were all identified with one of the factions that had come to make up the new party. Fremont won a preliminary, informal ballot, receiving 359 votes to 190 for McLean. On the formal roll call, Fremont won easily, winning 520 of the 567 votes. (Table, p. 685.)

A preliminary, informal ballot was taken for the vice presidency as well. William L. Dayton, a former senator from New Jersey, led with 253 votes, more than twice the total received by an Illinois lawyer, Abraham Lincoln, who had served in the House of Representatives, 1847–1849. On the formal ballot, Dayton swept to victory with 523 votes. His nomination was quickly made unanimous.

The Republican platform was approved by a voice vote. It was a document with sectional appeal, written by northern delegates for the North. Unlike the Democrats, the Republicans opposed the concept of popular sovereignty and believed that slavery should be prohibited in the territories. Specifically, the platform called for the admission of Kansas as a free state.

The Republicans also differed with the Democrats on the question of internal improvements, supporting the view that Congress should undertake river and harbor improvements. The Republican platform denounced the Ostend Manifesto, a document secretly drawn up by three of the Pierce administration's ambassadors in Europe, that suggested the United States either buy or take Cuba from Spain. The Republicans termed the manifesto a "highwayman's plea, that 'might makes right.'"

Both parties advocated the building of a transcontinental transportation system, with the Republicans supporting the construction of a railroad.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1856:

Slavery. This Convention of Delegates, assembled in pursuance of a call addressed to the people of the United States, without regard to past political differences or divisions, who are opposed to the repeal of the Missouri Compromise; to the policy of the present Administration; to the extension of Slavery into Free Territory; in favor of the admission of Kansas as a Free State; of restoring the action of the Federal Government to the principles of Washington and Jefferson....

That the Constitution confers upon Congress sovereign powers over the Territories of the United States for their government; and that in the exercise of this power, it is both the right and the imperative duty of Congress to prohibit in the Territories those twin relics of barbarism—Polygamy, and Slavery.

Cuba. That the highwayman's plea, that "might makes right," embodied in the Ostend Circular, was in every respect unworthy of American diplomacy, and would bring shame and dishonor upon any Government or people that gave it their sanction.

Transcontinental Railroad. That a railroad to the Pacific Ocean by the most central and practicable route is imperatively demanded by the interests of the whole country.

Internal Improvements. That appropriations by Congress for the improvement of rivers and harbors, of a national character, required for the accommodation and security of our existing commerce, are authorized by the Constitution, and justified by the obligation of the Government to protect the lives and property of its citizens.

American (Know-Nothings)

In addition to the Republicans, the American Party or Know-Nothings aspired to replace the Whigs as the nation's second major party. However, unlike the Republicans, the Know-Nothings were a national political organization, and the slavery issue that helped unite the Republicans divided the Know-Nothings. The main Know-Nothing concern was to place restrictions on the large number of European immigrants who arrived in the 1840s and 1850s.

The party held its first and only national convention in Philadelphia in February 1856. Several days before the convention began, the American Party's national council met and drew up the party platform. When the convention assembled, antislavery delegates objected to the platform, with its espousal of popular sovereignty, and called for the nomination of candidates who would outlaw slavery in the new territories. When their resolution was defeated, 141 to 59, these antislavery delegates—mainly from New England and Ohio—bolted the convention.

The remaining delegates nominated former president Millard Fillmore (1850–1853) of New York for president. Fillmore was popular in the South for his support of compromise slavery measures during his administration and was nominated on the second ballot. Andrew Jackson Donelson of Tennessee was chosen as the vice-presidential candidate.

In June 1856 several days before the Republican convention was scheduled to begin, the antislavery Know-Nothings assembled in New York and nominated Speaker of the House Nathaniel P. Banks of Massachusetts for the presidency and former governor William F. Johnston of Pennsylvania as his running mate. Banks, who actually favored Fremont's nomination, withdrew from the race when Fremont was chosen as the Republican candidate. Johnston bowed out in favor of Fremont's running mate, William L. Dayton, later in the campaign.

The Know-Nothing convention that had met earlier in Philadelphia adopted a platform similar to that of the Democrats on the slavery question. The document advocated non-interference in the affairs of the states and the concept of popular sovereignty for deciding slavery in the territories. Although also calling for economy in government spending, the bulk of the Know-Nothing platform dealt with restricting immigrants. Among the nativistic planks were proposals that native-born citizens be given the first chance for all government offices, that the naturalization period for immigrants be extended to twenty-one years, and that paupers and convicted criminals be kept from entering the United States.

Following are excerpts from the Know-Nothing platform of 1856:

Slavery, States' Rights. The unequalled recognition and maintenance of the reserved rights of the several states, and the cultivation of harmony and fraternal good-will between the citizens of the several states, and to this end, non-interference by Congress with questions appertaining solely to the individual states, and non-intervention by each state with the affairs of any other state.

The recognition of the right of the native-born and naturalized citizens of the United States, permanently residing in any territory thereof, to frame their constitutions and laws, and to regulate their domestic and social affairs in their own mode, subject only to the provisions of the federal Constitution, with the right of admission into the Union whenever they have the requisite population for one representative in Congress.

Nativism. Americans must rule America; and to this end, native-born citizens should be selected for all state, federal, or municipal offices of government employment, in preference to naturalized citizens....

No person should be selected for political station (whether of native or foreign birth), who recognizes any alliance or obligation of any description to any foreign prince, potentate or power, who refuses to recognize the federal and state constitutions (each within its own sphere), as paramount to all other laws, as rules of particular [political] action.

A change in the laws of naturalization, making a continued residence of twenty-one years, of all not heretofore provided for, an indispensable requisite for citizenship hereafter, and excluding all paupers or persons convicted of crime from landing upon our shores.

Democrats

In June 1856 delegates from all thirty-one states gathered in Cincinnati, Ohio, for the party's seventh quadrennial convention. It was the first Democratic convention to be held outside Baltimore.

Roll-call votes were taken during the first two days on the establishment of a platform committee and on the method of ticket allocation for the galleries. The first close vote came on the credentials committee report concerning the seating of two contesting New York delegations. By a vote of 136 to 123, the convention agreed to a minority report seating both contending factions and splitting the state's vote between them.

Three men were in contention for the party's presidential nomination: President Franklin Pierce of New Hampshire, James Buchanan of Pennsylvania, and Sen. Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois. All three had actively sought the nomination before. Ironically, Buchanan, who had spent the previous three years as ambassador to Great Britain, was in the most enviable position. Having been abroad, Buchanan had largely avoided the increasing controversy over slavery that bedeviled his major rivals.

Buchanan led on the first ballot with 135½ votes, with Pierce receiving 122½, and Douglas 33. As the balloting continued, Pierce lost strength, while both Buchanan and Douglas gained. After the fifteenth roll call, the vote stood: Buchanan, 168½, Douglas, 118½, and Pierce 3½. (Table, p. 685.)

While the two front-runners had substantial strength, neither of them was a sectional candidate. Both received votes from northern and southern delegations. With the possibility of a stalemate looming, Douglas withdrew after the sixteenth ballot. On the seventeenth roll call, Buchanan received all 296 votes, and the nomination.

On the first ballot for the vice presidency, eleven different individuals received votes. Rep. John A. Quitman of Mississippi led with 59 votes, followed by Rep. John C. Breckinridge of Kentucky, with 50. At the beginning of the second ballot, the New England delegations cast a nearly unanimous vote for Breckinridge, creating a bandwagon effect that resulted in the nomination of the Kentuckian. Ironically, before the vice-presidential balloting began, Breckinridge had asked that his name be withdrawn from consideration. Believing himself too young (he was thirty-five), Breckinridge stated that "promotion should follow seniority."

In spite of his earlier demurrer, Breckinridge was in the convention hall and announced his acceptance of the nomination. It marked one of the few times in American political history that a candidate was present for his or her nomination.

The party platform was considered in two segments, with the domestic and foreign policy sections debated separately. The theme of the domestic section, as in past platforms, was the Democrats' concept of a limited federal government. The unconstitutionality of a national bank, federal support for internal improvements, and distribution of proceeds from the sale of public land were again mentioned.

Nearly one-third of the entire platform was devoted to the slavery question, with support for the various congressional compromise measures stressed. The Democratic position was underscored in a passage that was capitalized in the convention Proceedings: "non-interference by Congress with slavery in state and territory, or in the District of Columbia."

In another domestic area, the Democrats denounced the Know-Nothings for being un-American. The convention approved the domestic policy section of the platform by a vote of 261 to 35, with only the New York delegation voting in opposition.

The foreign policy section expressed a nationalistic and expansionist spirit that was absent from previous Democratic platforms.

There were six different foreign policy planks, each voted on separately. The first plank, calling for free trade, passed 210 to 29. The second, favoring implementation of the Monroe Doctrine, passed 240 to 21. The third plank, backing westward continental expansion, was approved 203 to 56. The fourth plank, which expressed sympathy with the people of Central America, grew out of the U.S. dispute with Great Britain over control of that area. The plank was approved, 221 to 38. The fifth plank, calling for United States "ascendency in the Gulf of Mexico," passed 229 to 33. A final resolution, presented separately, called for the construction of roads to the Pacific Ocean. The resolution was at first tabled, 154 to 120, and a second vote to reconsider failed, 175 to 121. But when the resolution was raised a third time after the presidential nomination, it passed, 205 to 87.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1856:

Slavery. That claiming fellowship with, and desiring the cooperation of all who regard the preservation of the Union under the Constitution as the paramount issue—and repudiating all sectional parties and platforms concerning domestic slavery, which seek to embroil the States and incite to treason and armed resistance to law in the Territories; and whose avowed purposes, if consummated, must end in civil war and disunion, the American Democracy recognize and adopt the principles contained in the organic laws establishing the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska as embodying the only sound and safe solution of the "slavery question" upon which the great national idea of the people of this whole country can repose in its determined conservatism of the Union—NON-INTERFERENCE BY CONGRESS WITH SLAVERY IN STATE AND TERRITORY, OR IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Know-Nothings. [T]he liberal principles embodied in the Declaration of Independence ... makes ours the land of liberty and the asylum of the oppressed ... every attempt to abridge the privilege of becoming citizens ... ought to be resisted.

Since the foregoing declaration was uniformly adopted by our predecessors in National Conventions, an adverse political and religious test has been secretly organized by a party claiming to be exclusively American, it is proper that the American Democracy should clearly define its relation thereto, and declare its determined opposition to all secret political societies, by whatever name they may be called.

Free Trade. That there are questions connected with the foreign policy of this country, which are inferior to no domestic question whatever. The time has come for the people of the United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade.

Latin America. [W]e should hold as sacred the principles involved in the Monroe Doctrine: their bearing and import admit of no misconstruction; they should be applied with unbending rigidity.

Gulf of Mexico. That the Democratic party will expect of the next Administration that every proper effort be made to insure our ascendancy in the Gulf of Mexico.

Transcontinental Roads. That the Democratic party recognizes the great importance, in a political and commercial point of view, of a safe and speedy communication, by military and postal roads, through our own territory, between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

Whigs

On the verge of extinction, the Whig Party held its last national convention in September 1856. Delegates assembled in Baltimore from twenty-one states and endorsed the Know-Nothing ticket of Fillmore and Donelson.

However, the Whigs adopted their own platform. It avoided specific issues, instead calling for preservation of the Union. The platform criticized both the Democrats and Republicans for appealing to sectional passions and argued for the presidential candidacy of the former Whig, Millard Fillmore.

Following is an excerpt from the Whig platform of 1856:

Preserving the Union. That the Whigs of the United States are assembled here by reverence for the Constitution, and unalterable attachment to the National Union, and a fixed determination to do all in their power to preserve it for themselves and posterity. They have no new principles to announce—no new platform to establish, but are content broadly to rest where their fathers have rested upon the Constitution of the United States, wishing no safer guide, no higher law.

Democrats

Rarely in U.S. history has there been a convention as tumultuous as the one that assembled in Charleston, S.C., in April 1860. The Democrats met at a time when their party was threatened by sectional division, caused by the explosive slavery question. The issue had grown increasingly inflammatory during the 1850s, and, because of rising emotions, the chances of a successful compromise solution decreased.

From the outset of the convention, there was little visible effort to obtain party unity. Parliamentary squabbling with frequent appeals to the chair marked the early sessions. Before the presidential balloting even began, twenty-seven separate roll calls on procedural and platform matters were taken.

A bitter dispute between northern and southern delegates over the wording of the platform's slavery plank precipitated a walkout by several dozen southern delegates. Both the majority and minority reports submitted to the convention called for a reaffirmation of the Democratic platform of 1856. In addition, however, the majority report (favored by the South) declared that no government—local, state, or federal—could outlaw slavery in the territories. The minority report took a more moderate position, stating that the decision on allowing slavery in the territories should be left to the Supreme Court.

After a day of debate, the convention agreed, by a vote of 152 to 151, to recommit both reports to the platform committee. Basically, the vote followed sectional lines, with southern delegates approving recommitment. However, the revised majority and minority reports subsequently presented to the convention were similar to the originals.

An amendment by Benjamin F. Butler of Massachusetts, to endorse the 1856 platform without any mention of slavery, was defeated, 198 to 105. After two procedural roll calls, the delegates voted, 165 to 138, to accept the minority report. The vote followed sectional lines, with the northern delegates victorious. (Table, p. 686.)

Unhappy with the platform and unwilling to accept it, forty-five delegates from nine states bolted the convention. The majority of six southern delegations withdrew (Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, Texas, South Carolina, and Louisiana), along with scattered delegates from three other states (Arkansas, Delaware, and North Carolina).

With the size of the convention reduced, chairman Caleb Cushing of Massachusetts made an important decision. He ruled that the two-thirds nominating majority would be based on the total votes allocated (303) rather than the number of delegates present and voting. Although Cushing's ruling was approved by a vote of 141 to 112, it countered precedents established at the 1840 and 1848 Democratic conventions, when the nominating majority was based on those present and voting.

Cushing's ruling made it nearly impossible for any candidate to amass the necessary two-thirds majority. Particularly affected was the front-runner, Sen. Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, whose standing in the South had diminished with his continued support of popular sovereignty. Douglas moved into a big lead on the first ballot, receiving 145½ votes to 42 for Sen. Robert M.T. Hunter of Virginia and 35½ for James Guthrie of Kentucky. Despite his large lead over the rest of the field, Douglas was well short of the 202 votes needed for nomination and, with his limited sectional appeal, had little chance of gaining the needed delegates.

After three days of balloting and fifty-seven presidential roll calls, the standing of the three candidates had undergone little change. Douglas led with 151½ votes, followed by Guthrie with 65½, and Hunter with 16. The delegates, in session for ten days and wearied by the presidential deadlock, voted 194½ to 55½ to recess for six weeks and reconvene in Baltimore. This marked the first and only time that a major party adjourned its convention and moved it from one city to another.

Reconvening in Baltimore in June, the delegates were faced with another sticky question: whether or not to seat the delegates who had bolted the Charleston convention. The majority report presented by the credentials committee reviewed each case individually and recommended that the bolting southern delegates, except those from Alabama and Louisiana, be reseated. The minority report recommended that a larger majority of the withdrawing Charleston delegates be reseated. The minority report was defeated, 150 to 100½. Ten more roll calls followed on various aspects of the credentials dispute, but they did not change the result of the first vote. (Table, p. 686.)

The convention vote on credentials produced a new walkout, involving the majority of delegates from Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, Arkansas, California, and Oregon, and anti-Douglas delegates from Massachusetts. With the presidential balloting ready to resume, less than two-thirds of the original convention was present.

On the first ballot, Douglas received 173½ of the 190½ votes cast. On the second ballot, his total increased to 190½, but it was obviously impossible for him to gain two-thirds (202) of the votes allocated (303). After the second roll call, a delegate moved that Douglas, having obtained a two-thirds majority of the votes cast, be declared the Democratic presidential nominee. The motion passed unanimously on a voice vote. (Table, p. 686.)

The convention left the selection of the vice-presidential candidate to a caucus of the remaining southern delegates. They chose Sen. Benjamin Fitzpatrick of Alabama, who received all 198½ votes cast on the vice-presidential roll call.

Shortly after the convention adjourned, Fitzpatrick declined the nomination. For the first time in American history, a national committee filled a vacancy on the ticket. By a unanimous vote of committee members, the former governor of Georgia, Herschel V. Johnson, was chosen to be Douglas's running mate.

The Democratic platform, in addition to the controversial slavery plank, provided a reaffirmation of the 1856 platform, with its proposals for a limited federal government but an expansionist foreign policy. The 1860 platform added planks that continued the expansionist spirit, calling for the construction of a transcontinental railroad and acquisition of the island of Cuba.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1860:

Slavery. Inasmuch as difference of opinion exists in the Democratic party as to the nature and extent of the powers of a territorial legislature, and as to the powers and duties of Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, over the institution of slavery within the Territories,

Resolved, That the Democratic party will abide by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon these questions of Constitutional law.

Transcontinental Railroad. That one of the necessities of the age, in a military, commercial, and postal point of view, is speedy communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States; and the Democratic party pledge such Constitutional Government aid as will insure the construction of a Railroad to the Pacific coast, at the earliest practicable period.

Cuba. That the Democratic party are in favor of the acquisition of the Island of Cuba on such terms as shall be honorable to ourselves and just to Spain.

Southern Democrats (Breckinridge Faction)

A small group of southern delegates that bolted the Charleston convention met in Richmond, Va., in early June. They decided to delay action until after the resumed Democratic convention had concluded. In late June they met in Baltimore with bolters from the regular Democratic convention. There were representatives from nineteen states among the more than 200 delegates attending, but most of the fifty-eight northern delegates were officeholders in the Buchanan administration. Vice President John C. Breckinridge of Kentucky won the presidential nomination, and Sen. Joseph Lane of Oregon was chosen as his running mate.

The platform adopted by the Southern Democrats was similar to the one approved by the Democratic convention at Charleston. The bolters reaffirmed the Democrats' 1856 platform, which called for the construction of a transcontinental railroad and acquisition of Cuba. But on the controversial slavery issue, the rump assemblage adopted the southerners' plank defeated at the Charleston convention. The failure to reach agreement on this one issue, the most disruptive sectional split in the history of American political parties, presaged the Civil War.

Following are excerpts from the platform adopted by the Southern (or Breckinridge faction) Democrats in 1860:

Resolved, that the platform adopted by the Democratic party at Cincinnati be affirmed, with the following explanatory resolutions:

1. That the Government of a Territory organized by an act of Congress is provisional and temporary, and during its existence all citizens of the United States have an equal right to settle with their property in the Territory, without their rights, either of person or property, being destroyed or impaired by Congressional or Territorial legislation.

2. That it is the duty of the Federal Government, in all its departments, to protect, when necessary, the rights of persons and property in the Territories, and wherever else its constitutional authority extends.

Republicans

With their major opposition split along sectional lines, the Republicans gathered for their convention in Chicago in a mood of optimism. The Democrats had already broken up at Charleston before the Republican delegates convened in May 1860.

The call for the convention was addressed not only to faithful party members but to other groups that shared the Republicans' dissatisfaction with the policies of the Buchanan administration. The call to the convention particularly emphasized the party's opposition to any extension of slavery into the territories.

Delegates from all the northern states and the territories of Kansas and Nebraska, the District of Columbia, and the slave states of Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Texas assembled at Chicago's new 10,000-seat convention hall, known as the Wigwam. A carnival-like atmosphere enveloped Chicago, with bands marching through the streets and thousands of enthusiastic Republicans ringing the overcrowded convention hall.

Inside, the delegates' first debate concerned the credentials report. The question was raised whether the represented southern states should be allocated votes reflecting their electoral college strength, when there were few Republicans in these states. By a vote of 275½ to 171½, the convention recommitted the credentials report for the purpose of scaling down the vote allocation of the southern states.

A second debate arose over what constituted a nominating majority. The rules committee recommended that the nominating majority reflect the total electoral vote of all the states in the Union. The minority report argued that, since all the states were not represented, the nominating majority suggested by the rules committee would in fact require nearly a two-thirds majority. The minority report recommended instead that nominations be based on a simple majority of votes allocated for the states represented. The minority report passed, 349½ to 88½.

Sen. William H. Seward of New York was the front-runner for the presidential nomination and led on the first ballot. Seward received 173½ votes to lead runner-up Abraham Lincoln of Illinois, who had 102. Sen. Simon Cameron of Pennsylvania followed with 50½ votes, Salmon P. Chase of Ohio with 49, and Edward Bates of Missouri with 48. (Table, p. 687.)

With the packed galleries cheering their native son, Lincoln closed the gap on the second roll call. After two ballots, the voting stood: Seward, 184½; Lincoln, 181; Chase, 42½; Bates, 35. Lincoln, who had gained national prominence two years earlier as a result of his debates on slavery with Democrat Stephen A. Douglas in the 1858 campaign for the U.S. Senate, emerged as the candidate of the anti-Seward forces. On the third ballot, he won the nomination. When the third roll call was completed, Lincoln's vote total stood at 231½, 1½ votes short of a majority. But Ohio quickly shifted four votes to Lincoln, giving him the nomination. After changes by other states, the final vote was Lincoln, 340; Seward, 121½.

The primary contenders for the vice-presidential nomination were Sen. Hannibal Hamlin of Maine and Cassius M. Clay of Kentucky. Hamlin assumed a strong lead on the first ballot, receiving 194 votes to 100½ for Clay. On the second roll call, an increased vote for Hamlin from states in his native New England created a bandwagon for the Maine senator. Hamlin won the nomination on the second ballot with 367 votes, far outdistancing Clay, who received 86. After the roll call was completed, Hamlin's nomination was declared unanimous.

About half of the platform adopted by the Republican convention dealt with the slavery question. Unlike the Democrats, the Republicans clearly opposed the extension of slavery into the territories. However, the Republican platform also expressed support for states' rights, which served as a rebuke to radical abolitionism.

The Republican and Democratic platforms again were opposed on the question of internal improvements. The Republicans supported river and harbor improvements, while the Democrats, by reaffirming their 1856 platform, opposed any federal support for internal improvements. Both parties favored construction of a transcontinental railroad and opposed restrictions on immigration.

However, on two major issues, the Republicans went beyond the Democrats, advocating a protective tariff and homestead legislation.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1860:

Slavery. That the new dogma that the Constitution, of its own force, carries slavery into any or all of the territories of the United States, is a dangerous political heresy, at variance with the explicit provisions of that instrument itself, with contemporaneous exposition, and with legislative and judicial precedent; is revolutionary in its tendency, and subversive of the peace and harmony of the country.

That the normal condition of all the territory of the United States is that of freedom.... we deny the authority of Congress, of a territorial legislature, or of any individuals, to give legal existence to slavery in any territory of the United States.

States' Rights. That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the states, and especially the right of each state to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of powers on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends; and we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any state or territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes.

Tariff. That, while providing revenue for the support of the general government by duties upon imports, sound policy requires such an adjustment of these imports as to encourage the development of the industrial interests of the whole country.

Transcontinental Railroad. That a railroad to the Pacific Ocean is imperatively demanded by the interests of the whole country; that the federal government ought to render immediate and efficient aid in its construction; and that, as preliminary thereto, a daily overland mail should be promptly established.

Constitutional Union

At the invitation of a group of southern Know-Nothing members of the House, the remnants of the 1856 Fillmore campaign, conservative Whigs and Know-Nothings, met in Baltimore in May 1860 to form the Constitutional Union Party.

The chief rivals for the presidential nomination were former senator John Bell of Tennessee and Gov. Sam Houston of Texas. Bell won on the second ballot, and Edward Everett of Massachusetts was selected as his running mate.

The Constitutional Union Party saw itself as a national unifying force in a time of crisis. The brief platform did not discuss issues, instead denouncing the sectionalism of the existing parties and calling for national unity.

Following are excerpts from the Constitutional Union platform of 1860:

Whereas, Experience has demonstrated that Platforms adopted by the partisan Conventions of the country have had the effect to mislead and deceive the people, and at the same time to widen the political divisions of the country, by the creation and encouragement of geographical and sectional parties; therefore

Resolved, that it is both the part of patriotism and of duty to recognize no political principle other than THE CONSTITUTION OF THE COUNTRY, THE UNION OF THE STATES, AND THE ENFORCEMENT OF THE LAWS.

Republicans (Union Party)

Although elements in the Republican Party were dissatisfied with the conduct of the Civil War, President Abraham Lincoln was in firm control of his party's convention, which met in Baltimore in June 1864. As with previous Republican conventions, the call was not limited to the party faithful. Democrats in support of the Lincoln war policy were encouraged to attend, and the name "Union Party" was used to describe the wartime coalition.

Delegates were present from all the Northern states, the territories, the District of Columbia, and the slave states of Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, Tennessee, South Carolina, and Virginia. Credentials disputes occupied the early sessions. The credentials committee recommended that all the Southern states except South Carolina be admitted, but denied the right to vote. A minority report, advocating voting privileges for the Tennessee delegation, was passed, 310 to 151. A second minority report favoring voting privileges for Arkansas and Louisiana was approved, 307 to 167. However, the credentials committee recommendation that Florida and Virginia be denied voting rights, and South Carolina be excluded entirely, were accepted without a roll call.

Although dissatisfaction with the administration's war policy had spawned opposition to Lincoln, the boomlets for such presidential hopefuls as Treasury Secretary Salmon P. Chase petered out. The Lincoln forces controlled the convention, and the president was easily renominated on the first ballot. Lincoln received 494 of the 516 votes cast, losing only Missouri's 22 votes, which were committed to Gen. Ulysses S. Grant. After the roll call, Missouri moved that the vote be made unanimous. (Table, p. 688.)

Lincoln did not publicly declare his preference for a vice-presidential running mate, leaving the selection to the convention. The main contenders included incumbent vice president, Hannibal Hamlin of Maine; former senator and military governor of Tennessee, Democrat Andrew Johnson; and former senator Daniel S. Dickinson of New York. Johnson led on the first ballot with 200 votes, followed by Hamlin with 150 and Dickinson with 108. After completion of the roll call, a switch to Johnson by the Kentucky delegation ignited a surge to the Tennessean that delivered him 492 votes and the nomination.

The Republican (Union) platform was approved without debate. Unlike the Democrats, who criticized the war effort and called for a quick, negotiated peace, the Republicans favored a vigorous prosecution of the war until the South surrendered unconditionally. The Republicans called for the eradication of slavery, with its elimination embodied in a constitutional amendment.

Although the Republican document focused on the Civil War, it also included planks encouraging immigration, urging the speedy construction of a transcontinental railroad, and reaffirming the Monroe Doctrine.

Following are excerpts from the Republican (Union) platform of 1864:

Resolved, ... we pledge ourselves, as Union men, animated by a common sentiment and aiming at a common object, to do everything in our power to aid the Government in quelling by force of arms the Rebellion now raging against its authority, and in bringing to the punishment due to their crimes the Rebels and traitors arrayed against it.

Resolved, That we approve the determination of the Government of the United States not to compromise with Rebels, or to offer them any terms of peace, except such as may be based upon an unconditional surrender of their hostility and a return to their just allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that we call upon the Government to maintain this position and to prosecute the war with the utmost possible vigor to the complete suppression of the Rebellion, in full reliance upon the self-sacrificing patriotism, the heroic valor and the undying devotion of the American people to the country and its free institutions.

Resolved, That as slavery was the cause, and now constitutes the strength of this Rebellion, and as it must be, always and everywhere, hostile to the principles of Republican Government, justice and the National safety demand its utter and complete extirpation from the soil of the Republic ... we are in favor, furthermore, of such an amendment to the Constitution, to be made by the people in conformity with its provisions, as shall terminate and forever prohibit the existence of Slavery within the limits of the jurisdiction of the United States.

Resolved, That the thanks of the American people are due to the soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy, who have periled their lives in defense of the country and in vindication of the honor of its flag.

Democrats

The Democrats originally scheduled their convention for early summer but postponed it until late August to gauge the significance of military developments. The party, badly split during the 1860 campaign, no longer had the Southern faction with which to contend. But while there was no longer a regional split, new divisions arose over the continuing war. There was a large peace faction, known as the Copperheads, that favored a quick, negotiated peace with the South. Another faction supported the war but criticized its handling by the Lincoln administration. A third faction supported Lincoln's conduct of the war and defected to support the Republican president.

Although factionalized, the Democratic delegates who assembled in Chicago were optimistic about their party's chances. The war-weary nation, they thought, was ready to vote out the Lincoln administration if there was not a quick change in Northern military fortunes.

Although the border states were represented at the Democratic convention, the territories and seceded Southern states were not. In spite of the party's internal divisions, there was little opposition to the presidential candidacy of Gen. George B. McClellan of New Jersey. The former commander of the Union Army won on the first ballot, receiving 174 of the 226 votes cast. Former governor Thomas H. Seymour of Connecticut trailed with 38 votes. A switch to McClellan by several Ohio delegates prompted shifts by other delegations and brought his total to 202½. Clement Vallandigham, a leader of the Copperhead faction, moved that McClellan's nomination be made unanimous.

Eight candidates were placed in nomination for the vice presidency. James Guthrie of Kentucky led Rep. George H. Pendleton of Ohio, the favorite of the Copperheads, on the first ballot, 65½ to 55. However, shifts to Pendleton by Illinois, Kentucky, and New York after completion of the roll call created a bandwagon that led quickly to his unanimous nomination. In the convention hall at the time of his selection, Pendleton made a short speech of acceptance. (Table, p. 688.)

The platform adopted by the Democrats reflected the views of the Copperhead faction. The Lincoln administration's conduct of the Civil War was denounced, with particular criticism of the use of martial law and the abridgement of state and civil rights. The platform called for an immediate end to hostilities and a negotiated peace. The "sympathy" of the party was extended to soldiers and sailors involved in the war. Besides a criticism of the war and its conduct by the Lincoln administration, there were no other issues discussed in the platform.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1864:

Resolved, That this convention does explicitly declare, as the sense of the American people, that after four years of failure to restore the Union by the experiment of war, during which, under the pretense of a military necessity of war-power higher than the Constitution, the Constitution itself has been disregarded in every part, and public liberty and private right alike trodden down, and the material prosperity of the country essentially impaired, justice, humanity, liberty, and the public welfare demand that immediate efforts be made for a cessation of hostilities, with a view of an ultimate convention of the States, or other peaceable means, to the end that, at the earliest practicable moment, peace may be restored on the basis of the Federal Union of the States.

Resolved, That the sympathy of the Democratic party is heartily and earnestly extended to the soldiery of our army and sailors of our navy, who are and have been in the field and on the sea under the flag of our country, and, in the events of its attaining power, they will receive all the care, protection, and regard that the brave soldiers and sailors of the republic have so nobly earned.

Republicans

The “National Union Republican Party,” as the political organization was termed in its platform, held its first postwar convention in Chicago in May 1868. Delegations from the states of the old Confederacy were accepted; several included African Americans.

The turbulent nature of postwar politics was evident in the fact that Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, the clear front-runner for the Republican nomination, had been considered a possible contender for the Democratic nomination barely a year earlier. Less than six months before the convention, the basically apolitical Grant had broken with Andrew Johnson, who had become president following the assassination of Abraham Lincoln in 1865.

Grant’s was the only name placed in nomination, and on the ensuing roll call he received all 650 votes. (Table, p. 689.)

While the presidential race was cut and dried, the balloting for vice president was wide open, with eleven candidates receiving votes on the initial roll call. Sen. Benjamin F. Wade of Ohio led on the first ballot with 147 votes, followed by Gov. Reuben E. Fenton of New York with 126, Sen. Henry Wilson of Massachusetts with 119, and Speaker of the House Schuyler Colfax of Indiana with 115.

Over the next four ballots, Wade and Colfax were the front-runners, with Colfax finally moving ahead on the fifth ballot. His lead over Wade at this point was only 226 to 207, but numerous vote shifts after the roll call quickly pushed the Indiana representative over the top and gave him the nomination. After all the vote changes, Colfax’s total stood at 541, followed by Fenton with 69 and Wade with 38.

Not surprisingly, the platform adopted by the Republicans differed sharply with the Democrats over Reconstruction and Johnson’s presidency. The Republican platform applauded the radical Reconstruction program passed by Congress and denounced Johnson as “treacherous” and deserving of impeachment. The Republican platform approved of voting rights for black men in the South but determined that this was a subject for each state to decide in the rest of the nation.

The two parties also differed on their response to the currency question. While the Democrats favored a “soft money” policy, the Republicans supported a continued “hard money” approach, rejecting the Democratic proposal that the economic crisis could be eased by an increased supply of greenbacks.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1868:

Reconstruction. We congratulate the country on the assured success of the reconstruction policy of Congress, as evinced by the adoption, in the majority of the States lately in rebellion, of constitutions securing equal civil and political rights to all, and regard it as the duty of the Government to sustain those constitutions, and to prevent the people of such States from being remitted to a state of anarchy or military rule.

The guaranty by Congress of equal suffrage to all loyal men at the South was demanded by every consideration of public safety, of gratitude, and of justice, and must be maintained; while the question of suffrage in all the loyal States properly belongs to the people of those States.

President Andrew Johnson. We profoundly deplore the untimely and tragic death of Abraham Lincoln, and regret the accession of Andrew Johnson to the Presidency, who has acted treacherously to the people who elected him and the cause he was pledged to support; has usurped high legislative and judicial functions; has refused to execute the laws; has used his high office to induce other officers to ignore and violate the laws; has employed his executive powers to render insecure the property, the peace, the liberty, and life of the citizen; has abused the pardoning power; has denounced the National Legislature as unconstitutional; has persistently and corruptly resisted, by every means in his power, every proper attempt at the reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion; has perverted the public patronage into an engine of wholesale corruption; and has been justly impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, and properly pronounced guilty thereof by the vote of thirty-five senators.

Currency. We denounce all forms of repudiation as a national crime; and national honor requires the payment of the public indebtedness in the utmost good faith to all creditors at home and abroad, not only according to the letter, but the spirit of the laws under which it was contracted.

Democrats

Reunited after the Civil War, the Democratic Party held its first postwar convention in New York's newly constructed Tammany Hall. It was no accident that convention proceedings began on July 4, 1868. The Democratic National Committee had set the date, and its chairman, August Belmont of New York, opened the first session with a harsh criticism of Republican Reconstruction policy and the abridgement of civil rights.

Delegates from Southern states were voting members of the convention, but an effort to extend representation to the territories was defeated, 184 to 106.

Before the presidential balloting began, the convention chairman ruled that, as at the 1860 Charleston assembly, a nominating majority would be based on two-thirds of the total votes allocated (317) and not votes cast. On the opening ballot, the party's vice-presidential candidate four years earlier, George H. Pendleton of Ohio, took the lead. Pendleton, although popular in the economically depressed Midwest because of his plan to inflate the currency by printing more greenbacks, had little appeal in the eastern states. Nonetheless, he led on the first ballot with 105 votes. President Andrew Johnson was next, with 65 votes. Johnson's vote was largely complimentary and declined after the first roll call. Pendleton, however, showed increased strength, rising to a peak of 156½ votes on the eighth ballot. But Pendleton's total was well short of the 212 votes required to nominate, and his total steadily decreased after the eighth roll call. (Table, p. 690.)

The collapse of the Pendleton and Johnson candidacies produced a boom for Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock of Pennsylvania. Opponents of Hancock attempted to break his surge by calling for adjournment after the sixteenth ballot. Although the move for adjournment was defeated, 174½ to 14½, the Hancock boom began to lose momentum. The Civil War general peaked at 144½ votes on the eighteenth ballot, well short of a two-thirds majority.

With Hancock stymied, a new contender, Sen. Thomas A. Hendricks of Indiana, gained strength. Hendricks's vote rose to 132 on the twenty-first ballot, and the trend to the Indiana senator continued on the twenty-second ballot until the roll call reached Ohio. However, Ohio shifted its entire vote to Horatio Seymour, the permanent chairman of the convention and a former governor of New York. Seymour declined to be a candidate, and so announced to the convention, but Ohio did not change its vote, and friends of Seymour hustled the reluctant candidate from the hall. The bandwagon had begun, and when the vote switches were completed, Seymour had received all 317 votes.

The vice-presidential nomination went to Gen. Francis P. Blair Jr., of Missouri, a former Republican, who was unanimously selected on the first ballot. The names of several other candidates were placed in nomination, but the announcement of Blair's candidacy created a bandwagon that led to the withdrawal of the others.

The Democratic platform was accepted by a voice vote without debate. The platform began by declaring the questions of slavery and secession to be permanently settled by the Civil War. Several planks criticized the Republican Reconstruction program, passed by the party's Radical wing in Congress. The Radicals themselves were scathingly denounced for their "unparalleled oppression and tyranny." The Democratic platform expressed its support for Johnson's conduct as president and decried the attempts to impeach him.

For the first time, the question of the coinage and printing of money was discussed in the party platform. Two planks were included that could be generally interpreted as supporting Pendleton's inflationary greenback plan.

On the tariff issue, the Democrats called for a tariff that would primarily raise revenue but also protect American industry.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1868:

Reconstruction. ... [W]e arraign the Radical party for its disregard of right, and the unparalleled oppression and tyranny which have marked its career.

Instead of restoring the Union, it has, so far as in its power, dissolved it, and subjected ten States, in time of profound peace, to military despotism and negro supremacy.

President Andrew Johnson. That the President of the United States, Andrew Johnson, in exercising the power of his high office in resisting the aggressions of Congress upon the Constitutional rights of the States and the people, is entitled to the gratitude of the whole American people; and in behalf of the Democratic party, we tender him our thanks for his patriotic efforts in that regard.

Currency. ... [W]here the obligations of the government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide, that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and in justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States.... One currency for the government and the people, the laborer and the officeholder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bond-holder.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Horace Greeley
Liberal Republican, Democrat

Ulysses S. Grant
Republican

Liberal Republicans

The short-lived Liberal Republican Party grew out of grievances that elements in the Republican Party had with the policies of the Grant administration. There was particular dissatisfaction with the “carpetbag” governments in the South, support for extensive civil service reform and a general distaste for the corrupt administration of President Ulysses S. Grant.

The idea for the Liberal Republican movement originated in Missouri, where, in the 1870 state elections, a coalition of reform Republicans and Democrats swept to victory. In January 1872 a state convention of this new coalition issued the call for a national convention to be held that May in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Without a formal, nationwide organization, the delegate selection process was haphazard. Some of the delegates were self-appointed, but generally the size of each delegation reflected twice a state’s electoral vote.

Three separate groups—reformers, anti-Grant politicians, and a coalition of four influential newspaper editors known as “the Quadrilateral”—vied for control of the convention. For the presidential nomination, the reformers favored either Charles Francis Adams of Massachusetts or Sen. Lyman Trumbull of Illinois. The professional politicians were inclined to Supreme Court justice David Davis of Illinois or Horace Greeley of New York. The newspaper editors opposed Davis.

On the first ballot, Adams led with 203 votes, followed by Greeley with 147, Trumbull with 110, Gov. B. Gratz Brown of Missouri with 95, and Davis with 92½. After the roll call, Brown announced his withdrawal from the race and his support for Greeley. For the next five ballots, Greeley and Adams battled for the lead. But on the sixth ballot, the professional politicians were able to ignite a stampede for Greeley that resulted in his nomination.

Many of the reform-minded delegates, disgusted with the selection of the New York editor, left the convention. The vice-presidential nomination went on the second ballot to a Greeley supporter, Governor Brown of Missouri.

The platform adopted by the Liberal Republicans differed with the one later accepted by the Republicans on three main points: Reconstruction, civil service reform, and the tariff.

The Liberal Republicans called for an end to Reconstruction with its “carpetbag” governments, a grant of universal amnesty to southern citizens, and a return to home rule in the South. The Liberal Republicans sharply criticized the corruption of civil service under the Grant administration and labeled its reform one of the leading issues of the day. The civil service plank advocated a one-term limit on the presidency.

The presence of delegates supporting both protection and free trade led to a tariff plank that frankly stated the party’s position on the issue should be left to local determination.

Following are excerpts from the Liberal Republican platform of 1872:

Reconstruction. We demand the immediate and absolute removal of all disabilities imposed on account of the Rebellion, which was finally subdued seven years ago, believing that universal amnesty will result in complete pacification in all sections of the country.

Local self-government, with impartial suffrage, will guard the rights of all citizens more securely than any centralized power. The public welfare requires the supremacy of the civil over the military authority, and freedom of person under the protection of the habeas corpus.

Civil Rights. We recognize the equality of all men before the law, and hold that it is the duty of Government in its dealings with the people to mete out equal and exact justice to all of whatever nativity, race, color, or persuasion, religious or political.

Civil Service Reform. The Civil Service of the Government has become a mere instrument of partisan tyranny and personal ambition and an object of selfish greed. It is a scandal and reproach upon free institutions and breeds a demoralization dangerous to the perpetuity of republican government. We therefore regard such thorough reforms of the Civil Service as one of the most pressing necessities of the hour; that honesty, capacity, and fidelity constitute the only valid claim to public employment; that the offices of the Government cease to be a matter of arbitrary favoritism and patronage, and that public station become again a test of honor. To this end it is imperatively required that no President shall be a candidate for reelection.

Tariff. ... [R]ecognizing that there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of Protection and Free Trade, we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their Congress Districts, and to the decision of Congress thereon, wholly free of Executive interference or dictation.

Homesteading. We are opposed to all further grants of lands to railroads or other corporations. The public domain should be held sacred to actual settlers.

Democrats

The Democratic convention that met in Baltimore in July 1872 was one of the most bizarre in American political history. In sessions totaling only six hours, the delegates endorsed the decisions on candidates and platform made at a convention one month earlier by the Liberal Republicans. The Democratic convention merely rubber-stamped the creation of a coalition of Liberal Republicans and the core of the Democratic Party. (Table, p. 691.)

This new coalition was established with little dissent. When it came time for the presidential balloting, nominating speeches were not allowed. On the subsequent roll call, Greeley, the nominee of the Liberal Republicans, received 686 of the allotted 732 votes. It was an ironic choice, because in earlier decades Greeley, as editor of the New York Tribune, had been a frequent critic of the Democratic Party. More than anything else, however, Greeley's selection underscored the lack of strong leadership in the post-Civil War Democratic Party.

In similar fashion, the convention endorsed the nomination of B. Gratz Brown for vice president. Brown, the governor of Missouri and the choice of the Liberal Republicans, was the early unanimous nominee of the Democrats, with 713 votes.

By a vote of 574 to 158, the delegates agreed to limit debate on the platform to one hour. Except for a brief introduction, the Democrats approved the same platform that had been adopted by the Liberal Republicans a month earlier. Key planks called for an end to Reconstruction and complete amnesty for southern citizens, a return to a federal government with limited powers, civil service reform, and the halt of grants of public land to railroads and other corporations. Ironically, the platform also favored a hard-money policy, a reversal of the Democrats' soft-money stand in 1868. Although there was some objection to the point-by-point acceptance of the Liberal Republican platform, it was adopted by a vote of 671 to 62. (For platform excerpts, see the Liberal Republicans section, p. 547.)

Republicans

With the reform wing of the Republican Party already having bolted, the remaining elements of the party gathered in relative harmony in Philadelphia in June 1872. President Ulysses S. Grant was renominated without opposition, receiving all 752 votes cast. (Table, p. 691.)

The only contest at the convention centered around the vice-presidential nomination, with the incumbent, Schuyler Colfax of Indiana, and Sen. Henry Wilson of Massachusetts the two major rivals. Wilson took a slim plurality over Colfax on the first roll call, 364½ to 321½, but a vote shift by Virginia after completion of the roll gave Wilson the necessary majority with 399½ votes.

Without debate or opposition, the platform was adopted. It lauded the eleven years of Republican rule, noting the success of Reconstruction, the hard-money policy, and the homestead program. A tariff plank called for a duty on imports to raise revenue as well as to protect American business.

The platform also included several progressive planks, including a recommendation that the franking privilege be abolished, an extension of rights to women, and a call for federal and state legislation that would ensure equal rights for all races throughout the nation. The last plank was a significant change from the 1868 platform, which called for black suffrage in the South but left the decision on black voting rights to the individual states elsewhere.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1872:

Reconstruction. We hold that Congress and the President have only fulfilled an imperative duty in their measures for the suppression of violent and treasonable organizations in certain lately rebellious regions, and for the protection of the ballot-box, and therefore they are entitled to the thanks of the nation.

Civil Rights. Complete liberty and exact equality in the enjoyment of all civil, political, and public rights should be established and effectually maintained throughout the Union, by efficient and appropriate State and Federal legislation. Neither the law nor its administration should admit any discrimination in respect of citizens by reason of race, creed, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Civil Service Reform. Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing, and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage, and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life-tenure of office.

Tariff. ... [R]evenue ... should be raised by duties upon importations, the details of which should be so adjusted as to aid in securing remunerative wages to labor, and to promote the industries, prosperity, and growth of the whole country.

Homesteading. We are opposed to further grants of the public lands to corporations and monopolies, and demand that the national domain be set apart for free homes for the people.

Women's Rights. The Republican party is mindful of its obligations to the loyal women of America for their noble devotion to the cause of freedom. Their admission to wider fields of usefulness is viewed with satisfaction, and the honest demand of any class of citizens for additional rights should be treated with respectful consideration.

Republicans

The Republican convention assembled in Cincinnati, Ohio, in mid-June 1876. The call to the convention extended the olive branch to the dissident Liberal Republicans, who in large measure had rejoined their original party.

One of the highlights of the early sessions was a speech by the prominent black leader Frederick Douglass, who lambasted the Republicans for freeing the slaves without providing means for their economic or physical security.

A dispute developed over the seating of two contesting Alabama delegations. It was a candidate-oriented dispute, with the majority report favoring a delegation strongly for House Speaker James G. Blaine of Maine. The minority report supported a delegation pledged to Sen. Oliver P. Morton of Indiana. In the subsequent roll call, the convention decided in favor of the Blaine delegation by a vote of 369 to 360.

The presidential race was contested by the champions of the three nearly equal wings of the party. The Radicals were led by senators Roscoe Conkling of New York and Morton; the Half-Breeds, by Blaine; and the reformers, by former Treasury secretary Benjamin H. Bristow of Kentucky.

A fiery nominating speech for Blaine, delivered by Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, referred to the House Speaker as the “plumed knight,” an appellation that stuck with Blaine the rest of his political career. Although it was a compelling speech, its effect was reduced by a failure in the hall’s lighting system, which forced an early adjournment.

Nonetheless, when balloting commenced the next morning, Blaine had a wide lead, receiving 285 votes on the first ballot, compared with 124 for Morton, 113 for Bristow, and 99 for Conkling. (Table, p. 692.)

In the middle of the second ballot, a procedural dispute arose over the legality of the unit rule. Three delegates in the Pennsylvania delegation wished to vote for another candidate and appealed to the chair. The chair ruled that their votes should be counted, even though Pennsylvania was bound by the state convention to vote as a unit. The ruling of the chair was upheld on a voice vote, but subsequent debate brought a roll call on reconsidering the decision. The motion to reconsider passed, 381 to 359. However, by a margin of 395 to 353, another roll call upheld the power of the convention chairman to abolish the unit rule.

Although the vote had long-range significance for future Republican conventions, in the short run it provided a slight boost for Blaine, who gained several delegates in Pennsylvania. On the next four ballots, Blaine retained his large lead but could not come close to the necessary 379 votes needed for nomination. The only candidate to show increased strength was Gov. Rutherford B. Hayes of Ohio, who jumped from 68 votes on the fourth roll call to 104 on the fifth.

On the sixth ballot, however, Blaine showed renewed strength, rising to 308 votes, while Hayes assumed second place with 113. The House Speaker continued to gain on the seventh ballot, but the anti-Blaine forces quickly and successfully united behind Hayes. The Ohio governor, a viable compromise choice who had not alienated any of the party factions, won the nomination with 384 votes to 351 for Blaine.

Five candidates were placed in nomination for the vice presidency. However, Rep. William A. Wheeler of New York was so far in the lead that the roll call was suspended after South Carolina voted, and Wheeler was declared the nominee by acclamation.

Platform debate centered on the party's immigration plank. A Massachusetts delegate proposed deletion of the plank, which called for a congressional investigation of oriental immigration. The delegate argued that the plank was inconsistent with the Republican principle that favored the equality of all races. However, by a vote of 518 to 229, the plank was retained as written.

The Republican platform included a scathing denunciation of the Democratic Party, but only on the issues of currency and tariff was it markedly different from the opposition. The Republicans, unlike the Democrats, favored complete payment of Civil War bonds in hard money as quickly as possible. While the Democrats supported a tariff for revenue purposes only, the Republicans implied that the tariff should protect American industry as well as raise revenue.

As in past platforms, the Republicans called for the extension of civil rights, civil service reform, increased rights for women, the abolition of polygamy, and the distribution of public land to homesteaders. A new plank proposed that a constitutional amendment be passed forbidding the use of federal funds for non-public schools.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1876:

Currency. In the first act of congress, signed by President Grant, the national government ... solemnly pledged its faith "to make provisions at the earliest practicable period, for the redemption of the United States notes in coin." Commercial prosperity, public morals, and the national credit demand that this promise be fulfilled by a continuous and steady progress to specie payment.

Tariff. The revenue necessary for current expenditures and the obligations of the public debt must be largely derived from duties upon importations, which, so far as possible, should be so adjusted as to promote the interests of American labor and advance the prosperity of the whole country.

Immigration. It is the immediate duty of congress fully to investigate the effects of the immigration and importation of any Mongolians on the moral and material interests of the country.

Education. The public school system of the several states is the bulwark of the American republic; and, with a view to its security and permanence, we recommend an amendment to the constitution of the United States, forbidding the application of any public funds or property for the benefit of any school or institution under sectarian control.

Democratic Party. We therefore note with deep solicitude that the Democratic party counts, as its chief hope of success, upon the electoral vote of a united South, secured through the efforts of those who were recently arrayed against the nation; and we invoke the earnest attention of the country to the grave truth, that a success thus achieved would reopen sectional strife and imperil national honor and human rights.

We charge the Democratic party with being the same in character and spirit as when it sympathized with treason; with making its control of the house of representatives the triumph and opportunity of the nation's recent foes; with reasserting and applauding in the national capitol the sentiments of unrepentant rebellion; with sending Union soldiers to the rear, and promoting Confederate soldiers to the front; with deliberately proposing to repudiate the plighted faith of the government; with being equally false and imbecile upon the over-shadowing financial question; with thwarting the ends of justice, by its partisan mismanagements and obstruction of investigation; with proving itself, through the period of its ascendancy in the lower house of Congress, utterly incompetent to administer the government;—and we warn the country against trusting a party thus alike unworthy, recreant, and incapable.

Democrats

America's rapid westward expansion was typified by the site of the Democratic Party's 1876 convention—St. Louis, Missouri. It marked the first time that a national convention was held west of the Mississippi River.

The Democratic delegates assembled in late June. The one procedural matter debated was a proposal that the two-thirds rule be abolished at the 1880 convention and that the Democratic National Committee include such a recommendation in its next convention call. A move to table the proposal was defeated, 379 to 359. However, the national committee took no action on the proposal.

Two governors, Samuel J. Tilden of New York and Thomas A. Hendricks of Indiana, were the principal contenders for the presidential nomination, with Tilden having a substantial lead in delegates as the convention opened. Ironically, Tilden's most vocal opposition came from his New York delegation, where John Kelly of Tammany Hall spearheaded an effort to undermine Tilden's candidacy. Tilden's reform moves as governor had alienated Tammany Hall, and several times during the convention, Kelly took the floor to denounce Tilden.

Nonetheless, Tilden had a substantial lead on the first ballot, receiving 401½ votes to 140½ for Hendricks. Although short of the 492 votes needed to nominate, Tilden moved closer when Missouri switched its votes to him after the first roll call. The movement to Tilden continued on the second ballot, and he finished the roll call with 535 votes, more than enough to ensure his nomination. (Table, p. 693.)

Hendricks, the runner-up for the presidential nomination, was the nearly unanimous choice of the delegates for the vice presidency. Hendricks received 730 votes, with the other 8 votes not being cast.

The Democratic platform was an unusual one. Rather than being arranged in usual fashion with a series of numbered planks, it was written in paragraph form in language unusually powerful for a party platform. The theme of the document was the need for reform, and nearly half the paragraphs began with the phrase, “Reform is necessary...”

Debate focused on the party’s stand on the currency issue. The majority report proposed repeal of the Resumption Act of 1875, a hard-money measure that called for the payment of Civil War bonds in coin. A minority report sponsored by delegates from five eastern states proposing deletion of this position was defeated, 550 to 219. A second minority report, introduced by midwestern delegates, favored a more strongly worded opposition to the Resumption Act. It, too, was defeated, 505 to 229, with midwestern delegations providing the bulk of the minority vote. The platform as a whole was approved, 651 to 83, again with most of the dissenting votes coming from the Midwest.

Besides the currency proposal, the platform called for extensive civil service reform, a tariff for revenue purposes only, restrictions on Chinese immigration, and a new policy on the distribution of public land that would benefit the homesteaders and not the railroads. In addition to its reform theme, the platform was filled with sharp criticisms of Republican rule.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1876:

Civil Service Reform. Reform is necessary in the civil service. Experience proves that efficient economical conduct of the government is not possible if its civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot-box, be an approved reward of party zeal instead of posts of honor assigned for proved competency and held for fidelity in the public employ; that the dispensing of patronage should neither be a tax upon the time of our public men nor an instrument of their ambition. Here again, profession falsified in the performance attest that the party in power can work out no practical or salutary reform. Reform is necessary even more in the higher grades of the public service. President, Vice-President, judges, senators, representatives, cabinet officers—these and all others in authority are the people’s servants. Their offices are not a private perquisite; they are a public trust. When the annals of this Republic show disgrace and censure of a Vice-President; a late Speaker of the House of Representatives marketing his rulings as a presiding officer; three Senators profiting secretly by their votes as lawmakers; five chairmen of the leading committees of the late House of Representatives exposed in jobbery; a late Secretary of the Treasury forcing balances in the public accounts; a late Attorney-General misappropriating public funds; a Secretary of the Navy enriched and enriching friends by a percentage levied off the profits of contractors with his department; an Ambassador to England censured in a dishonorable speculation; the President’s Private Secretary barely escaping conviction upon trial for guilty complicity in frauds upon the revenue; a Secretary of War impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors—the demonstration is complete, that the first step in reform must be the people’s choice of honest men from another party, lest the disease of one political organization infect the body politic, and lest by making no change of men or parties, we get no change of measures and no real reform.

Currency. We denounce the improvidence which, in eleven years of peace, has taken from the people in Federal taxes thirteen times the whole amount of the legal-tender notes and squandered four times their sum in useless expense, without accumulating any reserve for their redemption. We denounce the financial imbecility and immorality of that party, which, during eleven years of peace, has made no advance toward resumption, no preparation for resumption, but instead has obstructed resumption by wasting our resources and exhausting all our surplus income, and while annually professing to intend a speedy return to specie payments, has annually enacted fresh hindrances thereto. As such hindrance we denounce the resumption clause of the act of 1875 and we here demand its repeal.

Tariff. We denounce the present tariff levied upon nearly four thousand articles as a masterpiece of injustice, inequality and false pretense, which yields a dwindling and not a yearly rising revenue, has impoverished many industries to subsidize a few... We demand that all customhouse taxation shall be only for revenue.

Homesteading. Reform is necessary to put a stop to the profligate waste of public lands and their diversion from actual settlers by the party in power, which has squandered two hundred millions of acres upon railroads alone, and out of more than thrice that aggregate has disposed of less than a sixth directly to the tillers of the soil.

Immigration. ... [W]e denounce the policy which thus discards the liberty-loving German and tolerates the revival of the coolie-trade in Mongolian women for immoral purposes, and Mongolian men held to perform servile labor contracts, and demand such modification of the treaty with the Chinese Empire, or such legislation within constitutional limitations, as shall prevent further importation or immigration of the Mongolian race.

Republicans

The Republicans gathered in Chicago beginning June 2, 1880, for their seventh quadrennial nominating convention. For the first time, the convention call was addressed only to Republicans and not more broadly to others who sympathized with party principles.

The convention was divided into two factions. One, headed by Sen. Roscoe Conkling of New York, favored the nomination of former president Ulysses S. Grant for a third term. The anti-Grant faction, although not united around one candidate, included the eventual nominee, Rep. James A. Garfield of Ohio, among its leaders.

Preconvention skirmishing focused on the selection of a temporary chairman. The Grant forces desired one from their ranks who would uphold the unit rule—a rule important to Grant, because he had the support of a majority of delegates in several large states. However, the Grant strategy was blocked, and a temporary chairman neutral to both sides was chosen by the Republican National Committee, leaving the ultimate decision on the unit rule to the convention.

A test of strength between the two factions came early in the convention on an amended motion by Conkling directing the credentials committee to report to the convention prior to the rules committee. Conkling's amended motion was defeated, 406 to 318.

In spite of the defeat of the amended motion, much time was spent debating delegate credentials. More than fifty cases were presented in committee, and seven of them came to the floor for a vote. Five of the cases featured seating disputes among delegates selected in district caucuses and those chosen for the same seats in state conventions. In each case—involving delegates from the states of Illinois, Kansas, and West Virginia—the convention supported the claim of the delegates elected at the district level.

The Illinois credentials fight produced the only candidate-oriented division, with the Grant forces favoring the seating of the delegates selected at the state convention. But by a margin of 387 to 353, the convention voted to seat the delegates selected in the district caucuses. Three other votes were taken on disputed credentials from different Illinois districts, but all were decided in favor of the anti-Grant forces by a similar margin. (Table, p. 694.)

The majority report of the rules committee advocated that the controversial unit rule not be used. A motion by the Grant forces that the presidential nominations begin without passage of the rules committee report was defeated, 479 to 276. The vote was a key setback for the supporters of the former president, as the majority report was subsequently adopted by acclamation.

While the Grant forces suffered defeat on adoption of the unit rule, their candidate assumed the lead on the first ballot for president, with 304 votes. Sen. James G. Blaine of Maine followed closely with 284, and Treasury Secretary John Sherman of Ohio, the candidate nominated by Rep. Garfield, trailed with 93 votes.

Ballot after ballot was taken throughout the day, but after the twenty-eighth roll call, the last of the night, there was little change in the vote totals of the leading candidates. Grant led with 307 votes, Blaine stayed in second with 279, and Sherman had 91.

When balloting resumed the next morning, Sherman's vote total jumped to 116, the biggest gain among the contenders, but still well behind Grant and Blaine. Grant gained votes on the thirty-fourth ballot, rising to a new high of 312, but on the same roll call a boom for Garfield began, with the Ohio representative collecting 16 votes from Wisconsin. Garfield protested that he was not a candidate but was ruled out of order by the chairman.

The Ohio representative continued to gain on the thirty-fifth ballot, his vote total rising to 50. On the next ballot, Garfield won the nomination, receiving the votes of nearly all the anti-Grant delegates. At the end of the roll call, Garfield had 399 votes; Grant, 306; and Blaine, 42; with nine votes distributed among other candidates.

Four men were placed in nomination for the vice presidency, but Chester A. Arthur of New York was the easy winner on the first ballot. Arthur, the former collector of the port of New York, received 468 votes to 193 for former representative Elihu B. Washburne of Illinois. Most of Arthur's support came from delegates who had backed Grant.

The Republican platform was passed by a voice vote without debate. For the first time, the platform included planks that clearly called for the exercise of federal power, emphasizing that the Constitution was "a supreme law, and not a mere contract." This philosophy contrasted with the Democratic platform, which favored home rule and government decentralization.

The two parties also differed on the tariff issue. The Republicans favored a revenue tariff that would also protect American industry, while the Democrats explicitly called for a revenue tariff only.

In its original form, the Republican platform did not include a civil service plank. An amendment from the floor, however, calling for a "thorough, radical and complete" reform of the civil service, was passed by a voice vote.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1880:

Federal Power. The Constitution of the United States is a supreme law, and not a mere contract. Out of confederated States it made a sovereign nation. Some powers are denied to the Nation, while others are denied to the States; but the boundary between the powers delegated and those reserved is to be determined by the National and not by the State tribunal.

The work of popular education is one left to the care of the several States, but it is the duty of the National Government to aid that work to the extent of its constitutional power. The intelligence of the Nation is but the aggregate of the intelligence in the several States, and the destiny of the Nation must be guided, not by the genius of any one State, but by the aggregate genius of all.

Tariff. We affirm the belief, avowed in 1876, that the duties levied for the purpose of revenue should so discriminate as to favor American labor....

Civil Service Reform. The Republican party... adopts the declaration of President Hayes that the reform of the civil service should be thorough, radical and complete.

Chinese Immigration. ... [T]he Republican party, regarding the unrestricted immigration of the Chinese as a matter of grave concernment ... would limit and restrict that immigration by the enactment of such just, humane and reasonable laws and treaties as will produce that result.

Greenback Party

A coalition of farmer and labor groups met in Chicago beginning June 9, 1880, to hold the second national Greenback Party convention. The party's first convention was held four years earlier, but it was not until 1880 that the Greenback Party received more than 2 percent of the popular vote. The Greenbacks would hold their third and final convention four years later, but the party would receive under 2 percent in the 1884 election.

The 1880 convention attracted representatives of the various Greenback Party factions, as well as forty-four delegates from the Socialist Labor Party. Rep. James B. Weaver of Iowa was nominated for the presidency, and B.J. Chambers of Texas was chosen as his running mate.

The platform adopted was far broader than the one conceived by the Greenbacks at their first convention in 1876. That year they focused solely on the currency issue. For the agrarian interests, currency planks remained that called for the unlimited coinage of silver and gold and the issuance of currency by the federal government and not private banks. Also adopted for the farm elements were planks advocating increased public land for settlers, denouncing large monopolies, and proposing that Congress control passenger and freight rates.

Included for the labor groups were proposals for an eight-hour day, the abolition of child labor, the improvement of working conditions, and the curtailment of Chinese immigration.

The Greenback platform also included planks that favored a graduated income tax and women's suffrage.

Following are excerpts from the Greenback platform of 1880:

Currency. ... All money, whether metallic or paper, should be issued and its volume controlled by the Government, and not by or through banking corporations, and when so issued should be a full legal-tender for all debts, public and private.

That the bonds of the United States should not be refunded, but paid as rapidly as practicable, according to contract. To enable the Government to meet these obligations, legal-tender currency should be substituted for the notes of the National banks, the National banking system abolished, and the unlimited coinage of silver, as well as gold, established by law.

Labor. That labor should be so protected by National and State authority as to equalize the burdens and insure a just distribution of its results; the eight-hour law of Congress should be enforced, the sanitary condition of industrial establishments placed under rigid control; the competition of contract labor abolished, a bureau of labor statistics established, factories, mines, and workshops inspected, the employment of children under fourteen years of age forbidden, and wages paid in cash.

Chinese Immigration. Slavery being simply cheap labor, and cheap labor being simple slavery, the importation and presence of Chinese serfs necessarily tends to brutalize and degrade American labor.

Homesteading. Railroad and land grants forfeited by reason of non-fulfillment of contract should be immediately reclaimed by the Government, and henceforth the public domain reserved exclusively as homes for actual settlers.

Regulation of Monopolies. It is the duty of Congress to regulate interstate commerce. All lines of communication and transportation should be brought under such legislative control as shall secure moderate, fair and uniform rates for passenger and freight traffic.

We denounce as destructive to prosperity and dangerous to liberty, the action of the old parties in fostering and sustaining gigantic land, railroad, and money corporations and monopolies, invested with, and exercising powers belonging to the Government, and yet not responsible to it for the manner of their exercise.

Income Tax. All property should bear its just proportion of taxation, and we demand a graduated income tax.

Women's Suffrage. That every citizen of due age, sound mind, and not a felon, be fully enfranchised, and that this resolution be referred to the States, with recommendation for their favorable consideration.

Democrats

The Democrats held their thirteenth quadrennial nominating convention in Cincinnati, Ohio, in late June 1880. Credentials disputes enlivened the early sessions, with two competing New York delegations the focus of attention. The challenging group, controlled by Tammany Hall, requested 20 of New York's 70 votes. But by a margin of 457 to 205½, the convention refused the request.

Samuel J. Tilden, the Democratic standard-bearer in 1876 and the narrow loser in that controversial election, was not a candidate in 1880, although he did not officially notify his supporters of this fact until the presidential balloting had begun. Tilden's indecision, however, had long before opened the door for other prospective candidates.

On the first ballot, Gen. Winfield Scott Hancock of Pennsylvania, a candidate for the nomination in both 1868 and 1876, led with 171 votes, followed by Sen. Thomas F. Bayard of Delaware with 153½, and former representative Henry G. Payne of Ohio (who served as a stalking horse for the Tilden forces) with 81. (Table, p. 695.)

Tilden's declaration of noncandidacy was announced before the second ballot, and the Tilden forces shifted their strength to House Speaker Samuel J. Randall of Pennsylvania. Nonetheless, Hancock was the big gainer on the second ballot, his vote total jumping to 320. Randall followed with 128½, and Bayard slipped to third place with 112. Although Hancock was well short of the 492 votes needed for nomination, Wisconsin began a string of vote switches to Hancock that resulted in the military leader's selection. After all the changes, Hancock received 705 of the 738 votes cast.

The vice-presidential nomination went by acclamation to former representative William H. English of Indiana, the only candidate.

The platform was accepted without debate or opposition. Its style of short, sharp phrases contrasted with the 1876 platform, which was written in flowing sentences built around the theme of the necessity of reform.

The 1880 platform called for decentralization of the federal government with increased local government, currency based on hard money, a tariff for revenue only, civil service reform, and an end to Chinese immigration. The platform saved its harshest language to describe the party's reaction to the controversial election of 1876, which it labeled "the great fraud."

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1880:

Government Centralization. Opposition to centralization and to that dangerous spirit of encroachment which tends to consolidate the powers of all departments in one, and thus to create whatever be the form of government, a real despotism. No sumptuary laws; separation of Church and State, for the good of each; common schools fostered and protected.

Currency. Home rule; honest money, consisting of gold and silver, and paper convertible into coin on demand.

Tariff. [A] tariff for revenue only.

Civil Service Reform. We execrate the course of this administration in making places in the civil service a reward for political crime, and demand a reform by statute which shall make it forever impossible for a defeated candidate to bribe his way to the seat of the usurper by billeting villains upon the people.

Chinese Immigration. No more Chinese immigration, except for travel, education, and foreign commerce, and that even carefully guarded.

Election of 1876. The great fraud of 1876–1877, by which, upon a false count of the electoral votes of two States, the candidate defeated at the polls was declared to be President, and for the first time in American history, the will of the people was set aside under a threat of military violence, struck a deadly blow at our system of representative government. The Democratic party, to preserve the country from the horrors of a civil war, submitted for the time in firm and patriotic faith that the people would punish this crime in 1880. This issue precedes and dwarfs every other. It imposes a more sacred duty upon the people of the Union than ever addressed the conscience of a nation of free men.

Republicans

The Republicans gathered in Chicago in June 1884 for their convention. For the first time, the call to the convention prescribed how and when delegates should be selected, an effort to avoid the credentials disputes that had besieged the convention four years earlier.

The assassination of President James A. Garfield three years earlier had opened up the Republican presidential race, and the party warhorse, James G. Blaine of Maine, emerged as the front-runner for the nomination. However, there was strong opposition to Blaine from several candidates, including the incumbent president, Chester A. Arthur of New York.

The first test between the two sides was over the choice of a temporary chairman. The Blaine forces supported former senator Powell Clayton of Arkansas, while the anti-Blaine coalition favored a black delegate from Mississippi, John R. Lynch. Lynch won by a vote of 424 to 384. (Table, p. 696.)

A motion by the Blaine forces to adjourn after the presidential nominating speeches was also beaten, 412 to 391. But on the first ballot Blaine assumed the lead with 334½ votes, followed by President Arthur with 278 and Sen. George F. Edmunds of Vermont with 93. Most of Arthur's strength was in the South, where the administration's patronage power had great effect.

Blaine gained votes on the next two ballots, his total rising to 375 on the third ballot, while Arthur dropped slightly to 274. After this roll call, the anti-Blaine forces tried to force adjournment but were defeated, 458 to 356. On the fourth ballot, Blaine received the nomination, winning 541 votes to 207 for Arthur, and 41 for Edmunds.

Sen. John A. Logan of Illinois was the only person placed in nomination for vice president. Logan, who earlier had been in contention for the presidential nomination, received 779 of the 820 votes in the convention for second place on the ticket.

The party platform was adopted without dissent, and on major issues was little different from the planks presented by the Democrats. The Republicans proposed a tariff that would both protect American industry and raise revenue, called for civil service reform, advocated restrictions on Chinese immigration, and favored increased availability of public lands for settlers. In addition, the Republicans adopted features of the Greenback Party platform, calling for government regulation of railroads and an eight-hour workday.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1884:

Tariff. We ... demand that the imposition of duties on foreign imports shall be made, not "for revenue only," but that in raising the requisite revenues for the government, such duties shall be so levied as to afford security to our diversified industries and protection to the rights and wages of the laborer; to the end that active and intelligent labor, as well as capital, may have its just reward, and the laboring man his full share in the national prosperity.

Chinese Immigration. [W]e denounce the importation of contract labor, whether from Europe or Asia, as an offense against the spirit of American institutions; and we pledge ourselves to sustain the present law restricting Chinese immigration, and to provide such further legislation as is necessary to carry out its purposes.

Labor. We favor the establishment of a national bureau of labor; the enforcement of the eight hour law.

Regulation of Railroads. The principle of public regulation of railway corporations is a wise and salutary one for the protection of all classes of the people; and we favor legislation that shall prevent unjust discrimination and excessive charges for transportation, and that shall secure to the people, and the railways alike, the fair and equal protection of the laws.

Democrats

The 1884 Democratic convention was held in Chicago in July. For the first time, the party extended delegate voting rights to the territories and the District of Columbia.

A debate over the unit rule highlighted the first day of the convention. Delegates from Tammany Hall, a minority of the New York delegation, presented an amendment to the temporary rules designed to abolish the unit rule. All the New York delegates were bound by their state convention to vote as a unit. However, the national convention defeated the amendment by a vote of 463 to 332, thus limiting the power of the Tammany delegates.

A resolution was passed opening the position of party chairman to individuals who were not members of the Democratic National Committee. Another resolution, to eliminate the two-thirds rule at future conventions, was put to a vote, but the roll call was suspended when it became apparent the resolution would not pass.

Several peculiarities were evident during the presidential nominating speeches. Sen. Thomas A. Hendricks of Indiana, the favorite of the Hoosier delegation, nominated former senator Joseph E. McDonald as the state's favorite son in a speech listing attributes that easily could have described Hendricks. Two seconding speeches for Gov. Grover Cleveland of New York were delivered by Tammany delegates who actually used the time to denounce Cleveland.

In spite of the opposition within his delegation, Cleveland was the front-runner for the nomination and had a big lead on the first ballot. Cleveland received 392 votes, easily outdistancing Sen. Thomas F. Bayard of Delaware, who had 170. Former senator Allen G. Thurman of Ohio was next, with 88. Hendricks received one vote but protested to the convention that he was not a candidate.

A boom for Hendricks was undertaken on the second ballot, with the Indiana delegation shifting its support from McDonald to Hendricks. However, Cleveland also gained and continued to hold a large lead over the rest of the field. After two roll calls, these vote totals stood: Cleveland, 475; Bayard, 151½; Hendricks, 123½; Thurman, 60. With the New York governor holding a majority of the vote, North Carolina switched to Cleveland, and this started a bandwagon that gave him the required two-thirds majority. After the shifts, Cleveland received 683 of the 820 votes in the convention. (Table, p. 697.)

Over the objections of the Indiana delegation, Hendricks was nominated for the vice presidency. The Indiana leaders were a bit upset that Hendricks did not receive the presidential nomination but did contribute to his nearly unanimous total for second place on the ticket. When the roll call was completed, Hendricks had received all but four votes.

The Democratic platform of 1884 was one of the longest documents adopted by the party in the nineteenth century. The platform was about 3,000 words long, with the first third devoted to a description of alleged Republican failures.

The platform straddled the increasingly important tariff issue. In 1880 the Democrats clearly favored a revenue tariff only, but the 1884 document called for both revenue and protection of American industry.

A minority report introduced by Benjamin F. Butler, former governor of Massachusetts, focused on the tariff issue. Butler advocated a duty on imports that would hit harder at luxury items and less on necessities than the tariff favored by the majority report and would ensure more protection for American labor. The minority report was defeated, 721½ to 96½.

Butler, a former Republican and, earlier in 1884, nominated for president by the Greenback and Anti-Monopoly parties, also introduced substitute planks on labor, monopoly, public corporations, currency, and civil service reform. These other planks were defeated by a voice vote, and the platform as written was adopted by acclamation.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1884:

Tariff. Knowing full well, ... that legislation affecting the operations of the people should be cautious and conservative in method, not in advance of public opinion, but responsive to its demands, the Democratic party is pledged to revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests.

But in making reduction in taxes, it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries, but rather to promote their healthy growth. From the foundation of this Government, taxes collected at the Custom House have been the chief source of Federal Revenue. Such they must continue to be. Moreover, many industries have come to rely upon legislation for successful continuance, so that any change of law must be at every step regardful of the labor and capital thus involved. The process of reform must be subject in the execution to this plain dictate of justice...

Sufficient revenue to pay all the expenses of the Federal Government ... can be got, under our present system of taxation, from the custom house taxes on fewer imported articles, bearing heaviest on articles of luxury, and bearing lightest on articles of necessity.

Civil Liberties—Civil Service Reform. We oppose sumptuary laws which vex the citizen and interfere with individual liberty; we favor honest Civil Service Reform, and the compensation of all United States officers by fixed salaries; the separation of Church and State; and the diffusion of free education by common schools, so that every child in the land may be taught the rights and duties of citizenship.

Chinese Immigration. [W]e ... do not sanction the importation of foreign labor, or the admission of servile races, unfitted by habits, training, religion, or kindred, for absorption into the great body of our people, or for the citizenship which our laws confer. American civilization demands that against the immigration or importation of Mongolians to these shores our gates be closed.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Clinton B. Fisk
Prohibitionist

Grover Cleveland
Democrat

Benjamin Harrison
Republican

Prohibition

The Prohibition Party held its fifth national convention in Indianapolis in late May 1888. The party had held conventions since the 1872 campaign, but not until 1888 did the Prohibitionists receive at least 2 percent of the popular vote.

The 1888 convention selected Clinton B. Fisk of New Jersey for president and John A. Brooks of Missouri as his running mate. While the platform focused on the need for prohibition, planks were included that covered other issues. The Prohibition Party favored a tariff that would both protect American industry and raise revenue, supported the extension of voting rights, favored immigration restrictions, and proposed the abolition of polygamy.

Following are excerpts from the Prohibition Party platform of 1888:

Prohibition. That the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation and sale of alcoholic beverages should be made public crimes, and prohibited as such.

Tariff. That an adequate public revenue being necessary, it may properly be raised by import duties; but import duties should be so reduced that no surplus shall be accumulated in the Treasury, and that the burdens of taxation shall be removed from foods, clothing and other comforts and necessities of life, and imposed on such articles of import as will give protection both to the manufacturing employer and producing laborer against the competition of the world.

Democrats

When the Democratic convention assembled in St. Louis in early June 1888, the party, for the first time since the outset of the Civil War, was in control of the White House. There was no contest for the presidential nomination, with the incumbent, Grover Cleveland, renominated by acclamation.

However, the death of Vice President Thomas A. Hendricks in 1885 left open the second place on the ticket.

Former senator Allen G. Thurman of Ohio was the favorite for the vice-presidential nomination and won easily on the first ballot with 684 votes. Gov. Isaac P. Gray of Indiana had 101 votes, and Gen. John C. Black of Illinois trailed with 36. After the nomination of the seventy-five-year-old Thurman, red bandannas were strung up around the hall. The bandanna was Thurman's political symbol, used extensively in his public habit of pinching snuff.

The platform was adopted by acclamation. It reaffirmed the Democratic platform written four years earlier, but in addition lauded the policies of President Cleveland and the achievements of Democratic rule, opposed the existing protective tariff and supported legislation to modify it and proposed a reformation of tax laws. A plank introduced from the floor favoring Irish home rule was included in the platform.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1888:

Tariff. The Democratic party of the United States, in National Convention assembled, renews the pledge of its fidelity to Democratic faith and reaffirms the platform adopted by its representatives in the Convention of 1884, and indorses the views expressed by President Cleveland in his last annual message to Congress as the correct interpretation of that platform upon the question of Tariff reduction; and also indorses the efforts of our Democratic Representatives in Congress to secure a reduction of excessive taxation....

Resolved, That this convention hereby indorses and recommends the early passage of the bill for the reduction of the revenue now pending in the House of Representatives.

Tax Reform. All unnecessary taxation is unjust taxation.... Every Democratic rule of governmental action is violated when through unnecessary taxation a vast sum of money, far beyond the needs of an economical administration, is drawn from the people and the channels of trade, and accumulated as a demoralizing surplus in the National Treasury.... The Democratic remedy is to enforce frugality in public expense and abolish needless taxation.

Federal Power. Chief among its principles of party faith are the maintenance of an indissoluble Union of free and indestructible States, now about to enter upon its second century of unexampled progress and renown; devotion to a plan of government regulated by a written Constitution, strictly specifying every granted power and expressly reserving to the States or people the entire ungranted residue of power.

Republicans

The Republicans assembled for their convention in Chicago in late June 1888. Not only was the party out of the White House for the first time since the Civil War, but a perennial contender for the presidential nomination, James G. Blaine, had taken himself out of the running. Although this encouraged a number of candidates to seek the nomination, none came near to mustering the needed majority as the balloting for president began.

The 832 convention votes were distributed among fourteen candidates, with Sen. John Sherman of Ohio leading the field with 229 votes. Circuit judge Walter Q. Gresham of Indiana followed with 107 votes, while four other candidates received more than 70 votes. During the rest of the day, two more ballots were taken, with little appreciable change in the strength of the candidates. After the third roll call, Sherman led with 244 votes, followed by Gresham with 123, and former governor Russell A. Alger of Michigan with 122.

The unexpected withdrawal from the race of Chauncey Depew of New York, the favorite of that state's delegation, prompted a call for adjournment after the third ballot. The motion passed, 531 to 287.

When balloting resumed the next morning, the biggest gainer was former senator Benjamin Harrison of Indiana. Although Sherman still held the lead with 235 votes on the fourth ballot, Harrison's vote total had leaped from 94 votes on the third to 216 on the fourth. There was little change on the fifth ballot, taken on a Saturday, and after the roll call the delegates approved, 492 to 320, a motion to adjourn until Monday. The motion was generally supported by delegates opposed to Harrison.

When the convention reconvened, both Sherman and Harrison showed small gains—Sherman rising to 244 votes and Harrison to 231. On the next roll call, the seventh, Harrison took the lead for the first time, thanks largely to a shift of votes from delegates previously holding out for Blaine. Harrison led, 279 to 230, and the trend to the Indianan accelerated to a bandwagon the next ballot. Harrison easily achieved a majority on the eighth roll call, winning 544 votes to 118 for Sherman. (Table, p. 698.)

Three individuals were placed in nomination for vice president, but former representative Levi P. Morton of New York was the runaway winner on the first ballot. Morton received 592 votes to easily outdistance Rep. William Walter Phelps of New Jersey, 119 votes, and William O. Bradley of Kentucky, 103.

The platform sharply differed from that of the Democrats on the important tariff issue, strongly supporting the protective tariff and opposing the legislation favored by the Democrats. Like the Democrats, the Republicans called for a reduction in taxes, specifically recommending repeal of taxes on tobacco and on alcohol used in the arts and for mechanical purposes. In other areas, the Republicans favored the use of both gold and silver as currency, strongly opposed the Mormon practice of polygamy, and called for veterans' pensions.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1888:

Tariff. We are uncompromisingly in favor of the American system of protection; we protest against its destruction as proposed by the President and his party. They serve the interests of Europe; we will support the interests of America.... The protective system must be maintained. Its abandonment has always been followed by general disaster to all interests, except those of the usurer and the sheriff. We denounce the Mills bill as destructive to the general business, the labor and the farming interests of the country, and we heartily indorse the consistent and patriotic action of the Republican Representatives in Congress in opposing its passage.

Tax Reform. The Republican party would effect all needed reduction of the National revenue by repealing the taxes upon tobacco, which are an annoyance and burden to agriculture, and the tax upon spirits used in the arts, and for mechanical purposes, and by such revision of the tariff laws as will tend to check imports of such articles as are produced by our people, the production of which gives employment to our labor, and releases from import duties those articles of foreign production (except luxuries), the like of which cannot be produced at home. If there shall remain a larger revenue than is requisite for the wants of the government we favor the entire repeal of internal taxes rather than the surrender of any part of our protective system at the joint behests of the whiskey trusts and the agents of foreign manufacturers.

Currency. The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

Veterans' Benefits. The gratitude of the Nation to the defenders of the Union cannot be measured by laws.... We denounce the hostile spirit shown by President Cleveland in his numerous vetoes of measures for pension relief, and the action of the Democratic House of Representatives in refusing even a consideration of general pension legislation.

Polygamy. The political power of the Mormon Church in the Territories as exercised in the past is a menace to free institutions too dangerous to be longer suffered. Therefore we pledge the Republican party to appropriate legislation asserting the sovereignty of the Nation in all Territories where the same is questioned, and in furtherance of that end to place upon the statute books legislation stringent enough to divorce the political from the ecclesiastical power, and thus stamp out the attendant wickedness of polygamy.

Republicans

Although President Benjamin Harrison was unpopular with various elements in the Republican Party, administration forces were in control of the convention that assembled in early June 1892, in Minneapolis, Minn. A Harrison supporter, governor and former representative William McKinley of Ohio, was elected without opposition as the convention's permanent chairman.

A question concerning the credentials of six Alabama delegates resulted in a protracted debate on whether the six delegates in question could vote on their own case. The situation was resolved when the Alabama delegates voluntarily abstained from voting. The minority report, which proposed seating the six Alabama delegates on the original roll, was defeated, 463 to 423½, and the majority report was subsequently adopted, 476 to 365½. The two votes were candidate-oriented, with the winning side in each case composed largely of Harrison voters.

Harrison's chances of renomination were so strong that two other possibilities, James G. Blaine and McKinley, never publicly announced as candidates for the presidency. Harrison won easily on the first ballot, receiving 535 ⅙ votes to 182 ⅙ for Blaine and 182 for McKinley. McKinley was in the ironic position of presiding over the convention at the same time he was receiving votes on the presidential ballot. McKinley withdrew briefly as permanent chairman and moved that Harrison's nomination be made unanimous. The motion was withdrawn after objections but placed McKinley publicly on the Harrison bandwagon. (Table, p. 699.)

While the Republican Party had an incumbent vice president in Levi P. Morton, the New York delegation supported Whitelaw Reid, the former editor of the New York Tribune and ambassador to France. With Morton making little effort to retain his position, Reid was nominated by acclamation, the first time a Republican convention had dispensed with a roll call in choosing a member of its national ticket.

The platform was adopted by a voice vote, and on only two major issues did it differ from that of the Democrats. The Republicans supported a protective tariff, clearly diverging from the Democrats, who supported import duties for revenue only. The Republicans also included a plank that sympathized with the prohibition effort, while the Democrats announced their opposition "to all sumptuary laws."

Both parties favored a bimetallic currency, with gold and silver of equal value, and supported the construction of a canal across Nicaragua. In addition, the Republicans advocated an expansionist foreign policy.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1892:

Tariff. We reaffirm the American doctrine of protection. We call attention to its growth abroad. We maintain that the prosperous condition of our country is largely due to the wise revenue legislation of the Republican congress.

We believe that all articles which cannot be produced in the United States, except luxuries, should be admitted free of duty, and that on all imports coming into competition with the products of American labor, there should be levied duties equal to the difference between wages abroad and at home.

Currency. The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetalism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal. The interests of the producers of the country, its farmers and its workingmen, demand that every dollar, paper or coin, issued by the government, shall be as good as any other.

Foreign Policy. We reaffirm our approval of the Monroe doctrine and believe in the achievement of the manifest destiny of the Republic in its broadest sense.

Central American Canal. The construction of the Nicaragua Canal is of the highest importance to the American people, both as a measure of National defense and to build up and maintain American commerce, and it should be controlled by the United States Government.

Prohibition. We sympathize with all wise and legitimate efforts to lessen and prevent the evils of intemperance and promote morality.

Democrats

One of the strangest conventions in party annals was held by the Democrats in Chicago in late June 1892. Much of the disturbance was due to stormy weather, with the accompanying noise and leaks in the roof frequently interrupting the proceedings. Inside the hall, the discomfort of the delegates was increased by the vocal opposition of 600 Tammany Hall workers to the renomination of former president Grover Cleveland of New York.

Although Cleveland was a solid favorite for renomination, he was opposed by his home state delegation. The Tammany forces engineered an early state convention that chose a delegation committed to Gov. David B. Hill. But in spite of the hostility of the New York delegation, Cleveland was able to win renomination on the first ballot, receiving 617  $\frac{1}{3}$  votes to 114 for Hill and 103 for Gov. Horace Boles of Iowa. (Table, p. 699.)

Four individuals were placed in nomination for the vice presidency, with Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois assuming the lead on the first ballot. Stevenson, a former representative and later assistant postmaster general during Cleveland's first administration, led former governor Isaac P. Gray of Indiana, 402 to 343. After the first roll call was completed, Iowa switched to Stevenson, starting a bandwagon that led quickly to his nomination. After all the switches had been tallied, Stevenson was the winner with 652 votes, followed by Gray with 185.

The platform debate centered around the tariff plank. The plank, as originally written, straddled the issue. But a sharply worded substitute proposed from the floor, calling for a tariff for revenue only, passed easily, 564 to 342. The currency section called for stable money, with the coinage of both gold and silver in equal amounts. The platform also included a plank that called for the construction of a canal through Nicaragua.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1892:

Tariff. We denounce Republican protection as a fraud, a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few. We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic party that the Federal Government has no constitutional power to impose and collect tariff duties, except for the purpose of revenue only, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of the Government when honestly and economically administered.

Currency. We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, or be adjusted through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts; and we demand that all paper currency shall be kept at par with and redeemable in such coin.

Central American Canal. For purposes of national defense and the promotion of commerce between the States, we recognize the early construction of the Nicaragua Canal and its protection against foreign control as of great importance to the United States.

Prohibition. We are opposed to all sumptuary laws, as an interference with the individual rights of the citizen.

Federal Power. [W]e solemnly declare that the need of a return to these fundamental principles of free popular government, based on home rule and individual liberty, was never more urgent than now, when the tendency to centralize all power at the Federal capital has become a menace to the reserved rights of the States that strikes at the very roots of our Government under the Constitution as framed by the fathers of the Republic.

Prohibition

The Prohibition Party's sixth convention was held in Cincinnati in late June 1892, and nominated John Bidwell of California for president and James B. Cranfill of Texas as his running mate. While the Prohibition Party continued to run a national ticket through the 1972 election, 1888 and 1892 marked the only years that the party received more than 2 percent of the popular vote.

Although beginning and ending with calls for prohibition, the 1892 platform as a whole was a reform-minded document, favoring women's suffrage and equal wages for women, an inflated currency, and the nationalization of railroad, telegraph, and other public corporations.

Following are excerpts from the Prohibition platform of 1892:

Prohibition. ... We declare anew for the entire suppression of the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation and transportation of alcoholic liquors as a beverage by Federal and State legislation, and the full powers of Government should be exerted to secure this result. Any party that fails to recognize the dominant nature of this issue in American politics is undeserving of the support of the people.

Women's Rights. No citizen should be denied the right to vote on account of sex, and equal labor should receive equal wages, without regard to sex.

Currency. The money of the country should consist of gold, silver, and paper, and be issued by the General Government only, and in sufficient quantity to meet the demands of business and give full opportunity for the employment of labor. To this end an increase in the volume of money is demanded, and no individual or corporation should be allowed to make any profit through its issue. It should be made a legal tender for the payment of all debts, public and private. Its volume should be fixed at a definite sum per capita and made to increase with our increase in population.

Tariff. Tariff should be levied only as a defense against foreign governments which levy tariff upon or bar our products from their markets, revenue being incidental.

Government Nationalization. Railroad, telegraph, and other public corporations should be controlled by the Government in the interest of the people.

People's Party (Populists)

The most successful of the nineteenth century farmer-labor coalitions was the People's Party, commonly known as the Populists, which formally organized as a political party at a convention in Cincinnati in May 1891. Further organization was accomplished at a convention in St. Louis the next February, from which emanated the call to the party's first national nominating convention, to be held that summer in Omaha, Neb. The election of 1892 was the only one in which the Populists received more than 2 percent of the national vote. Four years later the party endorsed the Democratic ticket, and from 1900 through 1908 the Populists ran separate tickets, but failed to receive 2 percent of the popular vote.

The call to the 1892 convention specified procedures for the selection of delegates and set the size of the convention at 1,776 delegates. In Omaha 1,300 to 1,400 delegates actually assembled for the Populist convention, which opened July 2. The field for the presidential nomination was reduced by the death early in 1892 of southern agrarian leader Leonidas L. Polk of North Carolina and the refusal of Judge Walter Q. Gresham of Indiana to seek the nomination. First place on the ticket went to former representative James B. Weaver of Iowa, who defeated Sen. James H. Kyle of South Dakota, 995 to 275.

James G. Field of Virginia won the vice-presidential nomination over Ben Terrell of Texas by a vote of 733 to 554. The ticket bridged any sectional division, pairing a former Union general (Weaver) with a former Confederate major (Field).

On July 4 the delegates enthusiastically adopted the platform. It contained few ideas that were not contained in the earlier platforms of other farmer-labor parties. But the document adopted by the Populists brought these proposals together into one forcefully written platform. More than half the platform was devoted to the preamble, which demanded widespread reform and sharply criticized the two major parties. It attacked the Democrats and Republicans for waging "a sham battle over the tariff," while ignoring more important issues.

The remainder of the platform was divided into three major parts that discussed finance, transportation, and land policy. The Populists proposed that the currency be inflated, with the unlimited coinage of silver and a substantial increase in the circulating medium to at least $50 per capita. The Populists' currency plank was sharply different from those of the two major parties, which favored a stable, bi-metallic currency.

The Populists also went well beyond the two major parties in advocating the nationalization of the railroads and telegraph and telephone companies. Both the Populists and Democrats advocated land reform, although the proposals received greater emphasis in the Populist platform.

The Populists included a call for a graduated income tax and expanded government power.

Although not considered part of the platform, supplementary resolutions were passed that favored the initiative and referendum, a limit of one term for the president, the direct election of senators, the secret ballot, and additional labor-oriented proposals that called for improvement in working conditions.

Following are excerpts from the Populist platform of 1892:

Preamble. The conditions which surround us best justify our co-operation; we meet in the midst of a nation brought to the verge of moral, political, and material ruin. Corruption dominates the ballot-box, the Legislatures, the Congress, and touches even the ermine of the bench. The people are demoralized; most of the states have been compelled to isolate the voters at the polling places to prevent universal intimidation and bribery. The newspapers are largely subsidized or muzzled, public opinion silenced, business prostrated, homes covered with mortgages, labor impoverished, and the land concentrating in the hands of capitalists. The urban workmen are denied the right to organize for self-protection; imported pauperized labor beats down their wages, a hireling standing army, unrecognized by our laws, is established to shoot them down, and they are rapidly degenerating into European conditions. The fruits of the toil of millions are boldly stolen to build up colossal fortunes for a few, unprecedented in the history of mankind; and the possessors of these, in turn despise the Republic and endanger liberty. From the same prolific womb of governmental injustice we breed the two great classes—tramps and millionaires....

We have witnessed for more than a quarter of a century the struggles of the two great political parties for power and plunder, while grievous wrongs have been inflicted upon the suffering people. We charge that the controlling influence dominating both these parties have permitted the existing dreadful conditions to develop without serious effort to prevent or restrain them. Neither do they now promise us any substantial reform. They have agreed together to ignore, in the coming campaign, every issue but one.

They propose to drown the outcries of a plundered people with the uproar of a sham battle over the tariff, so that capitalists, corporations, national banks, rings, trusts, watered stock, the demonetization of silver and the oppressions of the usurers may all be lost sight of. They propose to sacrifice our homes, lives, and children on the altar of mammon; to destroy the multitude in order to secure corruption funds from the millionaires....

We believe that the power of government—in other words, of the people—should be expanded (as in the case of the postal service) as rapidly and as far as the good sense of an intelligent people and the teachings of experience shall justify, to the end that oppression, injustice and poverty, shall eventually cease in the land.

While our sympathies as a party of reform are naturally upon the side of every proposition which will tend to make men intelligent, virtuous and temperate, we nevertheless regard these questions, important as they are, as secondary to the great issues now pressing for solution, and upon which not only our individual prosperity, but the very existence of free institutions depend; and we ask all men to first help us to determine whether we are to have a republic to administer, before we differ as to the conditions upon which it is to be administered, believing that the forces of reform this day organized will never cease to move forward, until every wrong is remedied, and equal rights and equal privileges securely established for all the men and women of this country.

Currency. We demand free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1.

We demand that the amount of circulating medium be speedily increased to not less than $50 per capita.

We demand that postal savings banks be established by the government for the safe deposit of the earnings of the people and to facilitate exchange.

Transportation. Transportation being a means of exchange and a public necessity, the government should own and operate the railroads in the interest of the people. The telegraph and telephone, like the post office system, being a necessity for the transmission of news, should be owned and operated by the government in the interest of the people.

Land. The land, including all the natural sources of wealth, is the heritage of the people, and should not be monopolized for speculative purposes, and alien ownership of land should be prohibited. All land now held by railroad and other corporations in excess of their actual needs, and all lands now owned by aliens, should be reclaimed by the government and held for actual settlers only.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

William McKinley

William J. Bryan
Democrat

Republicans

The currency issue, which spawned several third-party efforts in the late nineteenth century, emerged as the dominant issue of contention between the Republican and Democratic parties in the campaign of 1896. The forces in favor of the gold standard were firmly in control of the Republican convention that was held in St. Louis in early June 1896.

Actually, the convention was less a forum for the discussion of issues than a showcase for the political acumen of Mark

Hanna of Ohio. Hanna, William McKinley's campaign manager, had been intensely courting delegates across the country, especially in the South, for more than a year before the convention. Before the rap of the opening gavel, Hanna had amassed a majority of the delegates for the popular Ohio governor.

The first evidence of McKinley's strength came on a credentials question. A minority report was introduced claiming the credentials committee had held hearings on only two of 160 cases and proposing that the committee resume hearings. A maneuver to squelch the minority report was made when a delegate moved to cut off debate. With the McKinley forces providing most of the majority, the motion passed, 551½ to 359½.

Four other candidates in addition to McKinley were in contention for the presidential nomination, but McKinley was the runaway winner on the first ballot. He received 661½ votes to 84½ for the runner-up, House Speaker Thomas B. Reed of Maine. (Table, p. 700.)

There were two serious contenders for the vice-presidential nomination: Garret A. Hobart, a McKinley supporter and former state legislator from New Jersey, and Henry Clay Evans, a former candidate for governor of Tennessee. Hobart won, winning 523½ votes on the first ballot to 287½ for Evans.

As at the Democratic convention, the platform debate centered around the currency issue. The gold forces, firmly in control of the Republican convention, produced a majority report that called for maintenance of the gold standard until the time when bimetallism could be effected by an international agreement. This plank did not satisfy the silver minority. Led by Sen. Henry M. Teller of Colorado, a minority plank was introduced favoring the unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 16 to 1. Teller's plank, similar to the currency plank adopted later by the Democrats, was defeated, 818½ to 105½. A second roll call on adoption of the majority plank resulted in another decisive defeat for the silver forces. The majority plank carried, 812½ to 110½.

With the decisive defeat of the minority plank, Teller led a walkout by twenty-four silver delegates, including the entire Colorado and Idaho delegations and members of the Montana, South Dakota, and Utah delegations. The rest of the platform was adopted by a voice vote.

The currency plank that caused the commotion was buried deep in the middle of the Republican platform. The document began with a denunciation of Democratic rule and proceeded into a discussion of the merits of a protective tariff. A tariff for revenue purposes only was advocated in the Democratic platform, but the issue in the Republican document was clearly considered to be of secondary importance.

The Republican platform also differed from that of the Democrats in recommending a more expansionistic foreign policy, proposing stricter immigration restrictions and, for the first time, specifically denouncing the practice of lynching.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1896:

Currency. The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money.... We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country. We are therefore opposed to the free coinage of silver, except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the earth, which agreement we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained the existing gold standard must be maintained.

Tariff. We renew and emphasize our allegiance to the policy of protection, as the bulwark of American industrial independence, and the foundation of American development and prosperity.... Protection and Reciprocity are twin measures of American policy and go hand in hand. Democratic rule has recklessly struck down both, and both must be reestablished. Protection for what we produce; free admission for the necessities of life which we do not produce; reciprocal agreement of mutual interests, which gain open markets for us in return for our open markets for others. Protection builds up domestic industry and trade and secures our own market for ourselves; reciprocity builds up foreign trade and finds an outlet for our surplus.

Foreign Policy. Our foreign policy should be at all times firm, vigorous and dignified, and all our interests in the western hemisphere should be carefully watched and guarded.

The Hawaiian Islands should be controlled by the United States, and no foreign power should be permitted to interfere with them. The Nicaragua Canal should be built, owned and operated by the United States. And, by the purchase of the Danish Islands we should secure a much needed Naval station in the West Indies.... We, therefore, favor the continued enlargement of the navy, and a complete system of harbor and sea-coast defenses.

Immigration. For the protection of the equality of our American citizenship and of the wages of our workingmen, against the fatal competition of low priced labor, we demand that the immigration laws be thoroughly enforced, and so extended as to exclude from entrance to the United States those who can neither read nor write.

Lynching. We proclaim our unqualified condemnation of the uncivilized and preposterous [barbarous] practice well known as lynching, and the killing of human beings suspected or charged with crime without process of law.

Democrats

The Democratic convention that assembled in Chicago in July 1896 was dominated by one issue—currency. Delegates' viewpoint on this single issue influenced their position on every vote taken. Generally, the party was split along regional lines, with eastern delegations favoring a hard-money policy with maintenance of the gold standard, and most southern and western delegations supporting a soft-money policy with the unlimited coinage of silver.

Division in the convention was apparent on the first day, when the silver forces challenged the national committee's selection of Gov. David B. Hill of New York as temporary chairman. The prosilver delegates put up Sen. John W. Daniel of Virginia for the post, and Daniel won easily, 556 to 349. His victory indicated the dominance of the silver forces and presaged their ability to control the convention.

Two sets of credentials challenges were next on the agenda. By a voice vote, the convention agreed to seat a Nebraska delegation headed by a young silver supporter, William Jennings Bryan. By a vote of 558 to 368, the convention also defeated a recommendation to seat Michigan delegates supported by the hard-money majority on the national committee.

With their lack of strength apparent, the gold forces declined to run a candidate for president. However, the silver delegates could not initially coalesce behind one candidate, and fourteen individuals received votes on the first ballot. Rep. Richard P. “Silver Dick” Bland of Missouri was the pacesetter, with 235 votes, followed by Bryan, a former House member, with 137, and Robert E. Pattison, former Pennsylvania governor, with 97. Bryan, thirty-six years old, earlier had electrified the convention during the platform debate on currency, with his memorable “Cross of Gold” speech, which had elevated him to the position of a major contender. (Table, p. 701.)

On the next two roll calls, both candidates showed gains. Bland’s total climbed to 291 on the third ballot and Bryan’s rose to 219. Bryan continued to gain on the next ballot and assumed the lead over Bland, 280 to 241. The movement to Bryan accelerated on the fifth ballot, and he won the nomination easily, receiving 652 of the 930 convention votes. Although Bryan was the nearly unanimous choice of the silver forces, 162 gold delegates indicated their dissatisfaction with the proceedings by refusing to vote.

With Bryan declining to indicate a preference for vice president, sixteen candidates received votes for the office on the first ballot. The Nebraska delegation, following Bryan’s example, declined to participate in the vice-presidential balloting.

Former representative John C. Sibley of Pennsylvania took the lead on the first ballot with 163 votes, followed by Ohio editor and publisher John R. McLean with 111, and Maine shipbuilder Arthur Sewall with 100.

Bland spurted into the lead on the second ballot with 294 votes, followed by McLean and Sibley. After the roll call, Sibley withdrew, and on the third ballot the race between Bland and McLean tightened. The Missourian led, 255 to 210, but he too withdrew after the roll call. Sewall emerged as McLean’s major competitor on the fourth ballot, and with the withdrawal of the Ohio journalist from the race, the nomination was Sewall’s on the fifth ballot. Actually, Sewall’s vote total of 602 on the final roll call was less than two-thirds of the convention vote, but with 251 disgruntled gold delegates refusing to vote, the required majority was reduced to only those voting.

Not surprisingly, the platform debate centered around the currency plank. The eastern delegations proposed that, until silver coinage could be arranged by international agreement, the gold standard should be maintained. The southern and western delegations countered by demanding that the unlimited coinage of silver should begin without requiring a delay to reach an international agreement. Bryan managed the platform debate for the silver forces and scheduled himself as the final speaker, an enviable position from which to make a deep impression on the emotion-packed convention.

Bryan made the most of his opportunity, ending his dramatic speech with the famous peroration: “You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns, you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.” The gold plank was defeated, 626 to 303. Although the speech was a key factor in Bryan’s nomination, it was not influential in defeating the gold plank, which was already doomed to defeat. (Table, p. 701.)

A resolution commending the Cleveland administration was also defeated, 564 to 357, and after several attempts to modify the currency plank were rejected by voice votes, the platform as a whole was adopted, 622 to 307.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1896:

Currency. We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1 without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation.

Railroads. The absorption of wealth by the few, the consolidation of our leading railroad systems, and the formation of trusts and pools require a stricter control by the Federal Government of those arteries of commerce. We demand the enlargement of the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and such restriction and guarantees in the control of railroads as will protect the people from robbery and oppression.

No Third Term. We declare it to be the unwritten law of this Republic, established by custom and usage of 100 years, and sanctioned by the examples of the greatest and wisest of those who founded and have maintained our Government that no man should be eligible for a third term of the Presidential office.

Federal Power. During all these years the Democratic Party has resisted the tendency of selfish interests to the centralization of governmental power, and steadfastly maintained the integrity of the dual scheme of government established by the founders of this Republic of republics.

Under its guidance and teachings the great principle of local self-government has found its best expression in the maintenance of the rights of the States and in its assertion of the necessity of confining the general government to the exercise of the powers granted by the Constitution of the United States.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

William McKinley
Republican

William J. Bryan
Democrat

Republicans

Surface harmony was the hallmark of the Republican conclave held in Philadelphia in June 1900. The Colorado delegation, which had walked out of the 1896 convention, was honored by having one of its members, Sen. Edward O. Wolcott, chosen as temporary chairman.

There was no opposition to President William McKinley, and he won all 926 votes on the first roll call. However, the death of Vice President Garret A. Hobart in 1899 had left the second spot on the ticket open. McKinley did not have a preference and asked his campaign manager, Mark Hanna, not to influence the convention. McKinley's hands-off policy worked to the advantage of the popular governor of New York and hero of the Spanish-American War, Theodore Roosevelt, whom Hanna disliked. (Table, p. 702.)

Roosevelt's popularity, coupled with the desire of New York boss Thomas C. Platt to eliminate a powerful state rival, enabled the forty-one-year-old governor to clinch the nomination before balloting began. On the vice-presidential roll call, Roosevelt received all but one vote. The single uncast vote came from Roosevelt's New York delegation, which cast 71 of its 72 votes for Roosevelt.

The Republicans adopted a platform that applauded the four years of Republican rule and credited McKinley's policies with improving business conditions and winning the Spanish American War. The platform defended postwar expansionism and called for increased foreign trade and the creation of a Department of Commerce.

As in 1896, the Republican platform opposed the unlimited coinage of silver and supported maintenance of the gold standard. On the tariff issue, the Republicans continued to laud the protective duty on imports.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1900:

Foreign Trade, Panama Canal. We favor the construction, ownership, control and protection of an Isthmian Canal by the Government of the United States. New markets are necessary for the increasing surplus of our farm products. Every effort should be made to open and obtain new markets, especially in the Orient, and the Administration is warmly to be commended for its successful efforts to commit all trading and colonizing nations to the policy of the open door in China.

International Expansion. In accepting by the Treaty of Paris the just responsibility of our victories in the Spanish war, the President and the Senate won the undoubted approval of the American people. No other course was possible than to destroy Spain's sovereignty throughout the West Indies and in the Philippine Islands. That course created our responsibility before the world, and with the unorganized population whom our intervention had freed from Spain, to provide for the maintenance of law and order, and for the establishment of good government and for the performance of international obligations. Our authority could not be less than our responsibility; and whenever sovereign rights were extended it became the high duty of the Government to maintain its authority, to put down armed insurrection and to confer the blessings of liberty and civilization upon all the rescued peoples.

Antitrust. We recognize the necessity and propriety of the honest co-operation of capital to meet new business conditions and especially to extend our rapidly increasing foreign trade, but we condemn all conspiracies and combinations intended to restrict business, to create monopolies, to limit production, or to control prices; and favor such legislation as will effectively restrain and prevent all such abuses, protect and promote competition and secure the rights of producers, laborers, and all who are engaged in industry and commerce.

Currency. We renew our allegiance to the principle of the gold standard and declare our confidence in the wisdom of the legislation of the Fifty-sixth Congress, by which the parity of all our money and the stability of our currency upon a gold basis has been secured....

We declare our steadfast opposition to the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

Tariff. We renew our faith in the policy of Protection to American labor. In that policy our industries have been established, diversified and maintained. By protecting the home market competition has been stimulated and production cheapened.

Democrats

The Democrats opened their 1900 convention in Kansas City, Mo., on July 4, and showed a degree of party harmony not evident at their convention four years earlier. After the party factionalism of 1896, the delegates made a conscious effort to display a unified front—an effort aided by the decline of the controversial silver issue. The discovery of new gold deposits in North America and the subsequent increase in currency had lessened the divisive impact of the silver issue.

William Jennings Bryan, the Democratic standard-bearer in 1896, was renominated without opposition, receiving all 936 votes. The harmony in the convention was evident when former New York senator David B. Hill, a leader of the gold forces four years earlier, gave a seconding speech for Bryan. (Table, p. 702.)

Seven names were placed in nomination for the vice presidency. However, two withdrew before the balloting began. Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois, vice president under Grover Cleveland, led on the first roll call with 559½ votes, followed by Hill, who received 200 votes in spite of withdrawing from the race before the voting started. After completion of the ballot, a series of vote switches resulted in Stevenson's unanimous nomination.

The platform was adopted without floor debate. The major theme of the document was anti-imperialism, although an attack on trusts and a discussion of the currency question also were emphasized.

The anti-imperialism section was placed at the beginning of the platform and was labeled the most important issue of the campaign. The delegates enthusiastically accepted the plank, which forcefully criticized U.S. international expansion after the Spanish-American War. The platform asserted "that no nation can long endure half republic and half empire" and denounced increasing U.S. militarism. The Democratic position sharply differed from the one advocated by the Republicans, whose platform defended postwar expansionism.

After the anti-imperialism section was a sharp attack on monopolies, the most detailed antitrust section that had yet appeared in a Democratic platform. The plank called for more comprehensive antitrust legislation and more rigid enforcement of the laws already enacted. Although the Republicans also condemned monopolies, the issue received a mere one-sentence mention in their platform.

With the decline of the silver issue, the necessity of a prosilver plank was a matter of debate in the resolutions committee. However, Bryan threatened to withdraw his candidacy if the platform did not include a plank calling for the unlimited coinage of silver. By a majority of one vote, the resolutions committee included the silver plank, and it was accepted without dissent by the convention. The Democratic position set up another distinction with the Republicans, who, as four years earlier, favored maintenance of the gold standard.

In addition to the anti-imperialism, antitrust, and currency sections of the platform, the Democrats proposed the creation of a Department of Labor, favored the direct election of senators and, unlike the Republicans, supported the construction and ownership of a Nicaraguan canal. The Republican platform advocated construction and ownership of a canal across the Isthmus of Panama.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1900:

Anti-imperialism. We hold that the Constitution follows the flag, and denounce the doctrine that an Executive or Congress deriving their existence and their powers from the Constitution can exercise lawful authority beyond it or in violation of it. We assert that no nation can long endure half republic and half empire, and we warn the American people that imperialism abroad will lead quickly and inevitably to despotism at home....

We are not opposed to territorial expansion when it takes in desirable territory which can be erected into States in the Union, and whose people are willing and fit to become American citizens. We favor trade expansion by every peaceful and legitimate means. But we are unalterably opposed to seizing or purchasing distant islands to be governed outside the Constitution, and whose people can never become citizens....

The importance of other questions, now pending before the American people is no wise diminished and the Democratic party takes no backward step from its position on them, but the burning issue of imperialism growing out of the Spanish war involves the very existence of the Republic and the destruction of our free institutions. We regard it as the paramount issue of the campaign....

We oppose militarism. It means conquest abroad and intimidation and oppression at home. It means the strong arm which has ever been fatal to free institutions.... This republic has no place for a vast military establishment, a sure forerunner of compulsory military service and conscription. When the nation is in danger the volunteer soldier is his country's best defender.

Antitrust. We pledge the Democratic party to an unceasing warfare in nation, State and city against private monopoly in every form. Existing laws against trusts must be enforced and more stringent ones must be enacted.... Tariff laws should be amended by putting the products of trusts upon the free list, to prevent monopoly under the plea of protection.

Currency. We reaffirm and indorse the principles of the National Democratic Platform adopted at Chicago in 1896, and we reiterate the demand of that platform for an American financial system made by the American people for themselves, and which shall restore and maintain a bimetallic price-level, and as part of such system the immediate restoration of the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation.

Socialists

The Socialist Party held its first national nominating convention in Chicago in early May 1904 and nominated Eugene V. Debs of Indiana for president and Benjamin Hanford of New York as his running mate. Debs ran in 1900 as the presidential candidate of two socialist groups, the Social Democratic Party and a moderate faction of the Socialist Labor Party.

The bulk of the platform was devoted to the philosophy of the international Socialist movement, with its belief in the eventual demise of capitalism and the ultimate achievement of a classless, worker-oriented society. To hasten the creation of a Socialist society, the platform favored many reforms advocated by the Populists and earlier agrarian-labor movements: the initiative, referendum, and recall; women's suffrage; tax reform, including the graduated income tax; the public ownership of transportation, communication, and exchange; and various labor benefits, including higher wages and shorter hours.

Following are excerpts from the Socialist platform of 1904:

To the end that the workers may seize every possible advantage that may strengthen them to gain complete control of the powers of government, and thereby the sooner establish the cooperative commonwealth, the Socialist Party pledges itself to watch and work, in both the economic and the political struggle, for each successive immediate interest of the working class; for shortened days of labor and increases of wages; for the insurance of the workers against accident, sickness and lack of employment; for pensions for aged and exhausted workers; for the public ownership of the means of transportation, communication and exchange; for the graduated taxation of incomes, inheritances, franchises and land values, the proceeds to be applied to the public employment and improvement of the conditions of the workers; for the complete education of children, and their freedom from the workshop; for the prevention of the use of the military against labor in the settlement of strikes; for the free administration of justice; for popular government, including initiative, referendum, proportional representation, equal suffrage of men and women, municipal home rule, and the recall of officers by their constituents; and for every gain or advantage for the workers that may be wrested from the capitalist system, and that may relieve the suffering and strengthen the hands of labor. We lay upon every man elected to any executive or legislative office the first duty of striving to procure whatever is for the workers' most immediate interest, and for whatever will lessen the economic and political powers of the capitalist, and increase the like powers of the worker.

Republicans

President Theodore Roosevelt was totally in command of the Republican convention held in Chicago in June 1904. His most dangerous potential rival for the nomination, Sen. Mark Hanna of Ohio, had died in February, leaving the field clear for Roosevelt.

The rather trivial matter of most interest before the presidential balloting began was Hawaii's vote allocation. The rules committee recommended that the votes of the territory be reduced from six to two. A substitute amendment proposed that Hawaii retain its six votes for the 1904 convention but that its vote allocation be reviewed by the national committee for future conventions. The substitute was accepted by the narrow margin of 495 to 490.

Roosevelt's nomination caused less commotion. On the first ballot, he received all 994 votes. The party leadership favored Sen. Charles W. Fairbanks of Indiana for the vice presidency. Although the Georgia, Illinois, Missouri, and Nebraska delegations noted that they preferred other candidates, Fairbanks was nominated by acclamation. (Table, p. 704.)

The party platform was adopted without dissent. In the document the Republicans charted little new ground, instead detailing the benefits of Republican rule and restating old positions. America's expansionistic foreign policy was praised, as was the protective tariff and the gold standard.

A display of Roosevelt theatrics followed the adoption of the platform. The convention chairman was instructed to read a message from the secretary of state to the American consul in Morocco: "We want either Perdicaris alive or Raisuli dead." The message referred to an alleged American citizen, Ion Perdicaris, who had been captured by the Moroccan chieftain, Raisuli. The American ultimatum read to the convention followed the dispatch of several ships to Morocco. The reading of the message roused the delegates, as it was no doubt intended to do.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform in 1904:

Shipbuilding. We ... favor legislation which will encourage and build up the American merchant marine, and we cordially approve the legislation of the last Congress which created the Merchant Marine Commission to investigate and report upon this subject.

Monopoly. Combinations of capital and of labor are the results of the economic movement of the age, but neither must be permitted to infringe upon the rights and interests of the people. Such combinations, when lawfully formed for lawful purposes, are alike entitled to the protection of the laws, but both are subject to the laws and neither can be permitted to break them.

Democrats

William Jennings Bryan, after two unsuccessful campaigns for the presidency, was not a candidate for the Democratic nomination in 1904. However, he was present at the party's convention in St. Louis that July and was a prominent factor in the proceedings.

Bryan's first appearance before the convention came during a credentials dispute, featuring a challenge by Bryan supporters in Illinois to the state delegation approved by the credentials committee. Bryan spoke in behalf of his supporters, but their minority report was beaten, 647 to 299.

Bryan appeared again to second the presidential nomination of Sen. Francis M. Cockrell of Missouri, one of eight candidates nominated. Much of his speech, however, was devoted to criticizing the conservative front-runner, Alton B. Parker, chief justice of the New York Court of Appeals, while boosting more progressive candidates. In spite of Bryan's opposition, Parker came within 9 votes of receiving the necessary two-thirds majority on the first ballot. Parker had 658 votes, followed by Rep. William Randolph Hearst of

New York, with 200, and Cockrell, who trailed with 42. Although Hearst had progressive credentials, Bryan hesitated to support him and jeopardize his leadership of the progressive wing of the party.

With Parker so close to victory, Idaho shifted its votes to the New York judge, prompting enough switches by other states to give Parker 679 votes and the nomination. Hearst, with his strength in the Middle West and West, finished with 181 votes. (Table, p. 703.)

With the nomination in hand, Parker stunned the convention by sending a telegram to the New York delegation, announcing his support of the gold standard and advising the convention to select a new candidate if they found his position unacceptable. Parker supporters drafted a response stating that there was nothing to preclude his nomination, because the platform was silent on the currency issue.

Bryan, ill with a fever in his hotel but still a supporter of the silver cause, rose from his sickbed to join several southern leaders on the floor of the convention in denouncing Parker's telegram and the drafted response. Nonetheless, the response recommended by the Parker forces was approved, 794 to 191, with opposition principally from the Middle West and West.

For vice president, the convention chose former West Virginia senator Henry G. Davis. He nearly achieved a two-thirds majority on the first ballot, receiving 654 votes. With Davis's nomination so near, a motion to declare him the vice-presidential candidate was approved. Davis, at age eighty, was the oldest candidate ever put on a national ticket by a major party. He was a man of great wealth, and the Democrats hoped that he would give freely to their campaign.

Although the platform was accepted without debate by a voice vote, there was maneuvering behind the scenes to meet the objections of Bryan. The initial platform draft before the resolutions committee included a plank that declared that recent gold discoveries had removed the currency question as a political issue. Bryan found this plank objectionable and successfully fought in the resolutions committee for its deletion. Bryan was less successful in having an income tax plank included but was able to get a more strongly worded antitrust resolution.

Unlike the Democratic platform of 1900, which focused on anti-imperialism, antimonopoly, and currency, the 1904 platform covered about two dozen topics with nearly equal emphasis.

The Democrats and Republicans disagreed on one new issue: federal support for private shipping firms. The Democrats opposed government assistance; the Republicans favored it. But on other issues the platform of the Democrats, like that of the Republicans, broke little new ground, instead restating positions that had been included in earlier Democratic platforms. There was a continued attack on American imperialism and a call for a smaller army. There were planks that urged less international involvement and more emphasis on domestic improvements.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1904:

Roosevelt Administration. The existing Republican administration has been spasmodic, erratic, sensational, spectacular and arbitrary. It has made itself a satire upon the Congress, courts, and upon the settled practices and usages of national and international law ... the necessity of reform and the rescue of the administration of Government from the headstrong, arbitrary and spasmodic methods which distract business by uncertainty, and pervade the public mind with dread, distrust and perturbation.

Shipbuilding. We denounce the ship subsidy bill recently passed by the United States Senate as an iniquitous appropriation of public funds for private purposes and a wasteful, illogical and useless attempt to overcome by subsidy the obstructions raised by Republican legislation to the growth and development of American commerce on the sea.

We favor the upbuilding of a merchant marine without new or additional burdens upon the people and without bounties from the public treasury.

Socialists

The Socialists met in Chicago in May 1908 and renominated the ticket that had represented the party four years earlier: Eugene V. Debs of Indiana for president and Benjamin Hanford of New York as his running mate.

The platform was divided into several major sections, including a discussion of principles, and topics entitled general demands, industrial demands, and political demands. The Socialists' goal was the creation of a classless society, and in pursuance of this goal the movement was identified as a party of the working class.

Among the general demands were proposals for public works programs to aid the unemployed and public ownership of land, means of transportation and communication, and monopolies.

Industrial demands included calls for reduced working hours, the abolition of child labor, and more effective inspections of working areas.

The section on political demands began with a restatement of earlier positions, with a call for tax reform; women's suffrage; and the initiative, referendum, and recall. However, the section also included more radical demands, such as the abolition of the Senate, the amendment of the Constitution by popular vote, the direct election of all judges, and the removal of power from the Supreme Court to declare legislation passed by Congress unconstitutional.

Following are excerpts from the Socialist platform of 1908:

Public Works Projects. The immediate government relief for the unemployed workers by building schools, by reforestation of cutover and waste lands, by reclamation of arid tracts, and the building of canals, and by extending all other useful public works. All persons employed on such works shall be employed directly by the government under an eight hour work day and at the prevailing union wages. The government shall also loan money to states and municipalities without interest for the purpose of carrying on public works. It shall contribute to the funds of labor organizations for the purpose of assisting their unemployed members, and shall take such other measures within its power as will lessen the widespread misery of the workers caused by the misrule of the capitalist class.

Public Ownership. The collective ownership of railroads, telegraphs, telephones, steamship lines and all other means of social transportation and communication, and all land.

The collective ownership of all industries which are organized on a national scale and in which competition has virtually ceased to exist.

Labor. The improvement of the industrial condition of the workers.

(a) By shortening the workday in keeping with the increased productiveness of machinery.

(b) By securing to every worker a rest period of not less than a day and a half in each week.

(c) By securing a more effective inspection of workshops and factories.

(d) By forbidding the employment of children under sixteen years of age.

(e) By forbidding the interstate transportation of the products of child labor, of convict labor and of all uninspected factories.

(f) By abolishing official charity and substituting in its place compulsory insurance against unemployment, illness, accident, invalidism, old age and death.

Tax Reform. The extension of inheritance taxes, graduated in proportion to the amount of the bequests and the nearness of kin.

A graduated income tax.

Women's Suffrage. Unrestricted and equal suffrage for men and women....

Senate. The abolition of the senate.

Constitutional and Judicial Reforms. The abolition of the power usurped by the supreme court of the United States to pass upon the constitutionality of legislation enacted by Congress. National laws to be repealed or abrogated only by act of Congress or by a referendum of the whole people.

That the constitution be made amendable by majority vote.

That all judges be elected by the people for short terms, and that the power to issue injunctions shall be curbed by immediate legislation.

Republicans

The Republicans held their convention in Chicago in June 1908. Although President Roosevelt declined to be a candidate for reelection, his choice for the presidency, Secretary of War William Howard Taft, was assured of nomination before the convention began.

Of the 980 seats at the convention, 223 were contested, but all the challenges were settled before the convention assembled. However, a dispute arose over the vote-allocation formula for the next convention. An amendment to the rules committee report proposed that the vote allocation be based on population rather than the electoral vote, as was currently in effect. Essentially, the amendment would have reduced the power of the southern delegations. But a combination of southern delegates and Taft supporters from other states defeated the amendment, 506 to 471. (Table, p. 705.)

Seven names were placed in nomination for the presidency, but Taft was a landslide winner on the first ballot, receiving 702 votes. Sen. Philander C. Knox of Pennsylvania was a distant runner-up with 68 votes.

For vice president, the convention selected Rep. James S. Sherman, a conservative New Yorker. Sherman won 816 votes on the first ballot, easily outdistancing former New Jersey governor Franklin Murphy, who had 77 votes.

The Wisconsin delegation, led by Sen. Robert M. La Follette, introduced a detailed minority report to the party platform. The Wisconsin proposals were considered in several separate sections. The first section included proposals for the establishment of a permanent tariff commission, the creation of a Department of Labor, and the limitation of an eight-hour day for government workers. It was defeated, 952 to 28.

The second section recommended legislation to require the publication of campaign contributions. It was defeated, 880 to 94. Further sections of the minority report proposed the physical valuation of railroad property to help determine reasonable rates, and the direct election of senators. The railroad reform plank was beaten, 917 to 63, while the senatorial election plank was rejected, 866 to 114. After these votes, the majority report on the platform was adopted by a voice vote.

The platform approved by the delegates applauded the benefits of Republican rule, noting that under the party's guidance the United States had become the wealthiest nation on Earth. The principle of a protective tariff was applauded, as was the gold standard, an expansionist foreign policy and support for America's merchant marine.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1908:

Party Differences. In history, the difference between Democracy and Republicanism is that the one stood for debased currency, the other for honest currency; the one for free silver, the other for sound money; the one for free trade, the other for protection; the one for the contraction of American influence, the other for its expansion; the one has been forced to abandon every position taken on the great issues before the people, the other has held and vindicated all.

The present tendencies of the two parties are even more marked by inherent differences. The trend of Democracy is toward socialism, while the Republican party stands for a wise and regulated individualism.... Ultimately Democracy would have the nation own the people, while Republicanism would have the people own the nation.

Democrats

The Democratic convention of 1908 was held in July in Denver, Colo.—the first convention held by a major party in a western state. The convention was dominated by the Bryan forces, who regained control of the party after the conservative Alton B. Parker's landslide defeat in 1904.

Bryan's strength was evident on the first roll-call vote, concerning a Pennsylvania credentials dispute. The majority report claimed there were voting irregularities in five Philadelphia districts and urged the seating of Bryan delegates in place of those elected. By a vote of 604½ to 386½, the convention defeated the minority report, which argued for the delegates initially elected in the primary. The majority report then passed by a voice vote.

Bryan's presidential nomination was never in doubt. He was an easy winner on the first ballot, receiving 888½ votes to 59½ for Judge George Gray of Delaware and 46 for Gov. John A. Johnson of Minnesota. (Table, p. 704.)

Bryan left the choice of his running mate to the delegates. Although four names were placed in nomination, former Indiana gubernatorial candidate John W. Kern was chosen by acclamation. The New York Times sarcastically described the consistency of the Bryan-Kern ticket: "For a man twice defeated for the Presidency was at the head of it, and a man twice defeated for governor of his state was at the tail of it."

The platform adopted by the convention was tailored to Bryan's liking and had as its theme, "Shall the people rule?" The first portion of the document criticized Republican rule, specifically denouncing government overspending, a growing Republican-oriented bureaucracy, and an unethical link between big business and the Republican Party characterized by large, unreported campaign contributions.

Meeting three weeks after the Republicans, the Democrats adopted most of the minority planks rejected earlier by the Republicans. Included in the Democratic platform were calls for the physical valuation of railroads, the creation of a Department of Labor, eight-hour workdays for government employees, the direct election of senators, and a prohibition against corporate campaign contributions and individual contributions over "a reasonable amount." The two parties continued to disagree on support of the American merchant marine, the nature of tariff revision, and the direction of foreign policy, particularly regarding the lands acquired after the Spanish-American War.

The Democratic platform restated the party's support of a lower tariff, more extensive antitrust legislation with more rigid enforcement, a graduated income tax, increased power for the Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate railroads, telephone and telegraph companies, and a recommendation of prompt independence for the Philippines.

The Democrats included a plank abhorring Roosevelt's attempt to create a "dynasty," a direct reference to the outgoing president's handpicking his war secretary, William Howard Taft, as the next Republican presidential candidate.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1908:

Appeal to the Masses. The conscience of the nation is now aroused to free the Government from the grip of those who have made it a business asset of the favor-seeking corporations. It must become again a people's government, and be administered in all its departments according to the Jeffersonian maxim, "equal rights to all; special privileges to none."

"Shall the people rule?" is the overshadowing issue which manifests itself in all the questions now under discussion.

Campaign Contributions. We demand Federal legislation forever terminating the partnership which has existed between corporations of the country and the Republican party under the expressed or implied agreement that in return for the contribution of great sums of money wherewith to purchase elections, they should be allowed to continue substantially unmolested in their efforts to encroach upon the rights of the people....

We pledge the Democratic party to the enactment of a law prohibiting any corporation from contributing to a campaign fund and any individual from contributing an amount above a reasonable maximum, and providing for the publication before election of all such contributions.

Labor. Questions of judicial practice have arisen especially in connection with industrial disputes. We deem that the parties to all judicial proceedings should be treated with rigid impartiality, and that injunctions should not be issued in any cases in which injunctions would not issue if no industrial dispute were involved....

We favor the eight hour day on all Government work.

We pledge the Democratic party to the enactment of a law by Congress, as far as the Federal jurisdiction extends, for a general employer's liability act covering injury to body or loss of life of employees.

We pledge the Democratic party to the enactment of a law creating a Department of Labor, represented separately in the President's Cabinet, in which Department shall be included the subject of mines and mining.

Socialists

Eugene V. Debs of Indiana was nominated by the Socialists in 1912 to make his fourth run for the presidency. The convention, which met in Indianapolis in May, chose Emil Seidel of Wisconsin as his running mate.

The platform adopted by the Socialists was similar to the one written four years earlier, with calls for increased worker benefits, public works jobs for the unemployed, public ownership of land and the means of transportation and communication, tax reform, widespread political reform, and a social insurance program.

The Socialists also added new proposals, advocating public ownership of the banking and currency system, the introduction of minimum wage scales, the elimination of the profit system in government contracts, an increase in corporation taxes, and the direct election of the president and vice president.

Following are excerpts from the Socialist platform of 1912:

Social Insurance. By abolishing official charity and substituting a non-contributory system of old age pensions, a general system of insurance by the State of all its members against unemployment and invalidism and a system of compulsory insurance by employers of their workers, without cost to the latter, against industrial diseases, accidents and death.

Government Contracts. By abolishing the profit system in government work and substituting either the direct hire of labor or the awarding of contracts to cooperative groups of workers.

Minimum Wage. By establishing minimum wage scales.

Tax Reform. The adoption of a graduated income tax, the increase of the rates of the present corporation tax and the extension of inheritance taxes, graduated in proportion to the value of the estate and to nearness of kin—the proceeds of these taxes to be employed in the socialization of industry.

Banking and Currency. The collective ownership and democratic management of the banking and currency system.

Direct Election of President. The election of the President and Vice-President by direct vote of the people.

Republicans

The 1912 Republican convention was one of the most tumultuous ever. It was held in Chicago in June and served as a fiery culmination to the bitter contest between President William Howard Taft and former president Theodore Roosevelt for the party's presidential nomination.

Roosevelt had overwhelmed Taft in the presidential primaries, but Roosevelt's popular strength was more than offset by Taft's control of the national committee and southern delegations. Taft supporters held thirty-seven of fifty-three seats on the national committee, an edge that the incumbent president's managers used to advantage in settling seating disputes. Of the 1,078 convention seats, 254 were contested before the national committee, and 235 were settled in favor of Taft delegates. Although a number of Roosevelt challenges were made with little justification, the dispensation of the challenges showed Taft's control of the convention organization.

With the conservative Republicans united behind Taft, Roosevelt faced the additional problem of sharing support from the progressive wing of the party with another candidate, Sen. Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin. La Follette had only forty-one delegates; but, angered by Roosevelt's bid to control the progressive forces, refused to withdraw as a candidate.

The first skirmish at the convention was over the choice of a temporary chairman. The Taft forces favored Sen. Elihu Root of New York, while the Roosevelt delegates supported Gov. Francis E. McGovern of Wisconsin.

On a prolonged roll call, during which the vote of each delegate was taken individually, Root defeated McGovern, 558 to 501. (Table, p. 706.)

With the contest for the temporary chairmanship settled, the battle shifted to credentials. Virtually shut out in the settlement of credentials cases by the national committee, the Roosevelt forces brought seventy-two delegate challenges to the floor of the convention. Before consideration of the cases, the Roosevelt leaders moved that none of the challenged delegates (favorable to Taft) be allowed to vote on any of the credentials contests. However, a motion to table this proposal carried, 567 to 507, and the challenged delegates were allowed to vote on all cases except their own. Although the Taft forces were clearly in control of the convention, four credentials cases were presented for a vote, and all were decided in favor of the Taft delegates. The rest of the contests were settled by voice votes.

At this point, Roosevelt, who had dramatically come to Chicago to direct his forces, advised his delegates to abstain from voting but to remain in the convention as a silent protest to what he regarded as steamroller tactics. In the convention hall itself, the pro-Roosevelt galleries emphasized the feelings of their leader by rubbing sandpaper and blowing horns to imitate the sounds of a steamroller.

Only two names were placed in nomination for the presidency—Taft's and La Follette's. Taft was nominated by Warren G. Harding of Ohio, who himself would be president less than a decade later but at the time was merely a former lieutenant governor. With most of the Roosevelt delegates abstaining, Taft won easily on the first ballot with 556 votes. Roosevelt received 107 votes and La Follette 41, while 348 delegates were present and did not vote.

Vice President James S. Sherman was easily renominated, collecting 596 votes to 21 for the runner-up, Sen. William E. Borah of Idaho. However, 352 delegates were present but refused to vote, and 72 others were absent. In recognition of Sherman's failing health, the convention passed a resolution empowering the national committee to fill any vacancy on the ticket that might occur.

As in 1908, a progressive minority report to the platform was submitted. However, instead of taking individual votes on the various planks, the convention tabled the whole report by a voice vote. Subsequently, the majority report was accepted by a vote of 666 to 53, with 343 delegates present but not voting.

The platform lauded the accomplishments of the McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft administrations but contained few major positions different from the Democrats' platform. The Republican platform included, however, new planks favoring judicial reform and legislation publicizing campaign contributions and outlawing corporate campaign donations.

Although the Roosevelt delegates had remained in the convention hall as a silent protest to the renomination of Taft and Sherman, the groundwork for the creation of a Roosevelt-led third party had begun as soon as the credentials contests were settled in favor of Taft. Before the Republican convention even began its presidential balloting, Roosevelt announced that he would accept the nomination of the "honestly elected majority" of the Republican convention or a new progressive party. The next day, June 22, after final adjournment of the Republican convention, many of the Roosevelt delegates assembled in a Chicago auditorium to hear their leader announce his availability as a candidate of an honestly elected progressive convention. Gov. Hiram Johnson of California was named temporary chairman of the new party, and planning was begun to hold a national convention later in the summer.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1912:

Tariff. The protective tariff is so woven into the fabric of our industrial and agricultural life that to substitute for it a tariff for revenue only would destroy many industries and throw millions of our people out of employment. The products of the farm and of the mine should receive the same measure of protection as other products of American labor.

Campaign Contributions. We favor such additional legislation as may be necessary more effectually to prohibit corporations from contributing funds, directly or indirectly, to campaigns for the nomination or election of the President, the Vice-President, Senators, and Representatives in Congress.

We heartily approve the recent Act of Congress requiring the fullest publicity in regard to all campaign contributions, whether made in connection with primaries, conventions, or elections.

Judicial Reform. That the Courts, both Federal and State, may bear the heavy burden laid upon them to the complete satisfaction of public opinion, we favor legislation to prevent long delays and the tedious and costly appeals which have so often amounted to a denial of justice in civil cases and to a failure to protect the public at large in criminal cases.

Democrats

For the first time since 1872, the Democratic convention was held in Baltimore. The delegates, who assembled in the Maryland city in June, one week after the Republicans began their convention in Chicago, had a number of presidential candidates to choose from, although House Speaker Champ Clark of Missouri and Gov. Woodrow Wilson of New Jersey were the major contenders.

Once again, William Jennings Bryan had a major impact on the proceedings of a Democratic convention. His first appearance came in opposition to the national committee's selection of Judge Alton B. Parker of New York, the party's standard-bearer in 1904, as temporary chairman. Bryan nominated Sen. John W. Kern of Indiana for the post. In declining to be a candidate for temporary chairman, Kern recommended that Parker also withdraw as a candidate. But when Parker refused, Kern nominated Bryan for the post. Parker won on the roll call that followed, 579 to 508, with most of the Wilson delegates voting for Bryan, the Clark delegates splitting their support and delegates for other candidates favoring Parker. (Table, p. 707.)

The defeat of Bryan produced an avalanche of telegrams from across the country, with a contemporary estimate of more than 100,000 flooding the delegates in Baltimore. Most of the telegrams were written by progressives and served to weaken the candidacy of the more conservative Clark.

In an attempt to appease Bryan, Parker urged members of the platform committee to select the Nebraskan as their chairman. Bryan, however, refused this overture. Subsequently, the platform committee announced that, by a margin of 41 to 11, the committee had voted to delay presentation of the platform until after selection of the candidates.

The Wilson forces won their first key vote on a question involving the unit rule. The vote specifically concerned the Ohio delegation, where district delegates, elected for Wilson, were bound by the state convention to vote for Gov. Judson Harmon of Ohio. By a vote of 565½ to 491 ⅓, the convention approved the right of the district delegates to vote for Wilson.

The Wilson forces won another test on a credentials dispute concerning the South Dakota delegation. The credentials committee recommended seating a delegation pledged to Clark; but the convention, by a vote of 639½ to 437, supported the minority report, which called for seating delegates pledged to Wilson.

Bryan reappeared before the presidential balloting and introduced a resolution opposing the nomination of any candidate "who is the representative of or under obligation to J. Pierpont Morgan, Thomas F. Ryan, August Belmont, or any other member of the privilege-hunting and favor-seeking class." Bryan's resolution passed easily, 883 to 202½.

Six names were placed in nomination for the presidency. Clark led on the first ballot with 440½ votes, followed by Wilson with 324, Harmon with 148, and Rep. Oscar W. Underwood of Alabama with 117½. Under the two-thirds rule, 730 votes were needed to nominate. (Table, p. 707.)

For nine ballots, there was little change in the vote totals, but on the tenth roll call New York shifted its 90 votes from Harmon to Clark. Expecting a quick triumph, the Clark forces unleashed an hour-long demonstration. However, their celebration was premature. While Clark had 556 votes, a majority, his total was well short of the two-thirds majority required by the rules.

The tenth ballot proved to be the high-water mark for Clark. On succeeding roll calls, he slowly began to lose strength. During the fourteenth ballot, Bryan received permission to address the convention again, this time to explain his vote. "The Great Commoner" announced that he could not support a candidate endorsed by the Tammany-controlled New York delegation and, although bound earlier by state primary results to support Clark, was now switching his vote to Wilson. Most of the Nebraska delegation followed Bryan in voting for Wilson. After the fourteenth ballot, the vote totals stood: Clark, 553; Wilson, 361; Underwood, 111.

There were long intervals between other major vote switches. On the twentieth ballot, Kansas shifted 20 of its votes from Clark to Wilson. On the twenty-eighth ballot, after a weekend recess, Indiana's favorite son, Gov. Thomas R. Marshall, withdrew in favor of Wilson. The slow trend in favor of the New Jersey governor finally enabled Wilson to pass Clark on the thirtieth roll call, 450 to 455; Underwood remained a distant third with 121½ votes. (Table, p. 707.)

The convention adjourned for the evening after the forty-second ballot, but the Wilson momentum continued the next day. Illinois switched its 58 votes to Wilson on the forty-third ballot, giving him a simple majority with 602 votes. Clark continued to decline, slipping to 329 votes.

Wilson showed slight gains on the next two ballots, but the big break came on the forty-sixth roll call, when Underwood withdrew. This was followed by the withdrawal of Clark and the other remaining candidates. Wilson received 990 votes on the forty-sixth ballot, followed by Clark with 84.

Clark's failure to win the nomination marked the first occasion since 1844 that a candidate achieved a simple majority of the votes, without subsequently winning the necessary two-thirds majority. The forty-six roll calls also represented the highest number of presidential ballots taken at any convention, Republican or Democratic, since 1860.

Wilson preferred Underwood as his running mate, but the Alabama representative was not interested in second place on the ticket. On the vice-presidential roll call that followed, nine candidates received votes, led by Marshall with 389 votes and Gov. John Burke of North Dakota with 304 ⅔. Marshall lengthened his lead over Burke on the second ballot, 644½ to 386 ⅓. After the roll call was completed, a New Jersey delegate moved that Marshall's nomination be made unanimous, and the motion passed.

The Democratic platform was approved without debate before selection of the vice-presidential candidate. The platform restated a number of positions included in earlier party documents. It blamed the high cost of living on the protective tariff and the existence of trusts, and it called for a lower, revenue-only tariff and the passage of stronger antitrust legislation. The tariff issue was one of the major areas on which there was a marked difference between the parties, as the Republicans continued to support a protective tariff.

As in 1908, planks were included favoring the publicizing of campaign contributions and calling for the prohibition of corporate contributions and a limit on individual contributions.

The Democrats' labor plank was also virtually a restatement of the party's position four years earlier, supporting creation of a Department of Labor, a more limited use of injunctions, the guaranteed right of workers to organize, and passage of an employees' compensation law. In contrast to the Democrats' support of employers' liability, the Republicans advocated workmen's compensation legislation.

Unlike the Republicans, the Democrats called for federal legislation to regulate the rates of railroad, telegraph, telephone, and express companies based on valuation by the Interstate Commerce Commission. A plank was also included in the Democratic platform calling for the ratification of constitutional amendments establishing a graduated income tax and the direct election of senators—issues on which the Republican platform was silent. Imperialism was again denounced, as it had been in every Democratic platform since 1900.

New planks advocated a single-term presidency, the extension of presidential primaries to all states, reform of the judicial system to eliminate delays and cut expenses in court proceedings, and the strengthening of the government's pure food and public health agencies.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1912:

Single-term Presidency. We favor a single Presidential term, and to that end urge the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution making the President of the United States ineligible to reelection, and we pledge the candidates of this Convention to this principle.

Presidential Primaries. The movement toward more popular government should be promoted through legislation in each State which will permit the expression of the preference of the electors for national candidates at presidential primaries.

Judicial Reform. We recognize the urgent need of reform in the administration of civil and criminal law in the United States, and we recommend the enactment of such legislation and the promotion of such measures as will rid the present legal system of the delays, expense, and uncertainties incident to the system as now administered.

States' Rights. Believing that the most efficient results under our system of government are to be attained by the full exercise by the States of their reserved sovereign powers, we denounce as usurpation the efforts of our opponents to deprive the States of any of the rights reserved to them, and to enlarge and magnify by indirection the powers of the Federal government.

Progressives

Early in August 1912 the bolting Roosevelt forces assembled in Chicago and nominated their leader to guide a new party, the Progressives. More than 2,000 delegates, representing every state except South Carolina, gathered for the three-day convention. It was a diverse assembly that matched the Populists in crusading idealism and included, for the first time, women as well as men politicians and social workers as well as businesspeople.

While the delegates enthusiastically sang “Onward, Christian Soldiers” and “The Battle Hymn of the Republic” and cheered the appearance of Roosevelt before the convention, there was some dissension caused by the party's racial policy.

During the campaign for the Republican presidential nomination, Taft had the support of party organizations in the South, which included African Americans. As a result, Roosevelt directed his appeal strictly to white leaders in the region. Describing southern black delegates as uneducated and purchasable, Roosevelt insisted that only “lily white” delegations from the South be seated at the Progressive convention, but he allowed blacks to be included in delegations from other states. Although there was no floor debate on this policy, a number of liberal delegates were dissatisfied with Roosevelt's decision.

Both Roosevelt and his handpicked choice for vice president, Gov. Hiram W. Johnson of California, were nominated by acclamation. Jane Addams, a Chicago social worker and leader in the women's rights movement, gave evidence of the role of women in the Progressive Party by delivering a seconding speech for Roosevelt.

Like the nominations of the Progressive standard-bearers, the party platform was adopted by acclamation. But the voice vote hid the dissatisfaction felt by midwestern and western Progressives over the antitrust plank. Most of the Progressives from these regions favored the busting of trusts through enforcement of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Roosevelt, however, favored government regulation rather than trust-busting.

The platform approved by the convention included the trust-busting position. However, Roosevelt and his close advisers deleted the section in the official report. While there was obvious disagreement in the party on this issue, there was no floor debate or roll-call vote on the subject.

With the theme “A Covenant with the People,” the platform argued for increased democratization coupled with more people-oriented federal programs. The party favored nationwide presidential primaries; the direct election of senators; the initiative, referendum, and recall; and women's suffrage. Additionally, the Progressives proposed that state laws ruled unconstitutional be submitted to a vote of the state electorate.

The platform also advocated congressional reforms: the registration of lobbyists, the publicizing of committee hearings except in foreign affairs, and the recording of committee votes.

Like the Democrats, the Progressives favored creation of a Department of Labor and a more limited use of labor injunctions, but additionally the new party called for a prohibition of child labor and convict contract labor.

The Progressives went beyond both major parties in proposing the union of government health agencies into a single national health service and the creation of a social insurance system that would assist both the elderly and workers who were ill or unemployed. To help support their proposed federal programs, the Progressives recommended passage of the income tax amendment and establishment of a graduated inheritance tax.

Having adopted their platform and selected their candidates, the delegates to the Progressive convention adjourned by singing the "Doxology."

Following are excerpts from the Progressive platform of 1912:

Electoral Reform. In particular, the party declares for direct primaries of the nomination of State and National officers, for nationwide preferential primaries for candidates for the presidency; for the direct election of United States Senators by the people; and we urge on the States the policy of the short ballot, with responsibility to the people secured by the initiative, referendum and recall.

Women's Suffrage. The Progressive party, believing that no people can justly claim to be a true democracy which denies political rights on account of sex, pledges itself to the task of securing equal suffrage to men and women alike.

Judicial Reform. That when an Act, passed under the police power of the State, is held unconstitutional under the State Constitution, by the courts, the people, after an ample interval for deliberation, shall have an opportunity to vote on the question whether they desire the Act to become law, notwithstanding such decision.

Campaign Contributions. We pledge our party to legislation that will compel strict limitation of all campaign contributions and expenditures, and detailed publicity of both before as well as after primaries and elections.

Congressional Reform. We pledge our party to legislation compelling the registration of lobbyists; publicity of committee hearings except on foreign affairs, and recording of all votes in committee....

National Health Service. We favor the union of all the existing agencies of the Federal Government dealing with the public health into a single national health service without discrimination against or for any one set of therapeutic methods, school of medicine, or school of healing with such additional powers as may be necessary to enable it to perform efficiently such duties in the protection of the public from preventable diseases as may be properly undertaken by the Federal authorities, including the executing of existing laws regarding pure food, quarantine and cognate subjects, the promotion of vital statistics and the extension of the registration area of such statistics, and cooperation with the health activities of the various States and cities of the Nation.

Social Insurance. The protection of home life against the hazards of sickness, irregular employment and old age through the adoption of a system of social insurance adapted to American use....

Antitrust Action. We therefore demand a strong National regulation of inter-State corporations ... we urge the establishment of a strong Federal administrative commission of high standing, which shall maintain permanent active supervision over industrial corporations engaged in inter-State commerce, or such of them as are of public importance, doing for them what the Government now does for the National banks, and what is now done for the railroads by the Inter-State Commerce Commission.

Income and Inheritance Taxes. We believe in a graduated inheritance tax as a National means of equalizing the obligations of holders of property to Government, and we hereby pledge our party to enact such a Federal law as will tax large inheritances, returning to the States an equitable percentage of all amounts collected.

We favor the ratification of the pending amendment to the Constitution giving the Government power to levy an income tax.

Tariff. We demand tariff revision because the present tariff is unjust to the people of the United States. Fair dealing toward the people requires an immediate downward revision of those schedules wherein duties are shown to be unjust or excessive....

The Democratic party is committed to the destruction of the protective system through a tariff for revenue only—a policy which would inevitably produce widespread industrial and commercial disaster.

Republicans and Democrats. Political parties exist to secure responsible government and to execute the will of the people.

From these great tasks both of the old parties have turned aside. Instead of instruments to promote the general welfare, they have become the tools of corrupt interests which use them impartially to serve their selfish purposes. Behind the ostensible government sits enthroned an invisible government owing no allegiance and acknowledging no responsibility to the people.

To destroy this invisible government, to dissolve the unholy alliance between corrupt business and corrupt politics is the first task of the statesmanship of the day.

States' Rights. The extreme insistence on States' rights by the Democratic party in the Baltimore platform demonstrates anew its ability to understand the world into which it has survived or to administer the affairs of a union of States which have in all essential respects become one people.

Republicans

The Republicans and Progressives both held their conventions in Chicago in early June 1916. Leaders of both parties were ready to negotiate to heal the split that had divided the Republican Party in 1912.

Before the convention began, the Republican National Committee already had effected reform in the vote-allocation formula. To meet the objection raised in 1912 that the South was overrepresented, the national committee adopted a new method of vote allocation that considered a state's Republican voting strength as well as its electoral vote. Under the new formula, the southern states lost seventy-eight delegate seats, or more than a third of their 1912 total.

But while the Republicans were willing to make some internal reforms, most party leaders were adamantly opposed to nominating the hero of the Progressives, Theodore Roosevelt. Before the presidential balloting began, the Republican convention approved by voice vote the selection of a five-man committee to meet jointly with representatives of the Progressive convention, with the hope of finding a course of action that would unify the two parties.

However, the Republican representatives reported back that the Progressives, while desiring unity with the Republicans, firmly favored the nomination of Roosevelt. The Republican convention chairman, Sen. Warren G. Harding of Ohio, instructed the conferees to continue negotiations but allowed the presidential balloting to begin.

Charles Evans Hughes, a Supreme Court justice and former governor of New York, was the front-runner for the Republican nomination. Hughes did not actively seek the nomination and remained on the Supreme Court during the pre-convention period. But he was viewed by many party leaders as an ideal compromise candidate, because of his progressive credentials and lack of involvement in the divisive 1912 campaign.

However, some conservative party leaders felt Hughes was too progressive and sought other candidates. Seventeen men received votes on the first ballot, led by Hughes with 253½. Next were Sen. John W. Weeks of Massachusetts with 105 votes and former senator Elihu Root of New York with 103. Five of the other vote recipients had at least 65 votes each. The justice widened his lead on the second ballot, receiving 328½ votes to 98½ for Root. After the second roll call the convention voted 694½ to 286½ to recess for the evening. Most of the votes for adjournment came from delegates outside the Hughes column. (Table, p. 708.)

While the Republican convention was in recess, the joint committee of Republicans and Progressives continued to negotiate. The Republican members proposed Hughes as a compromise candidate, but in a message from his home in Oyster Bay, New York, Roosevelt stunned both parties by suggesting the name of Henry Cabot Lodge, a conservative senator from Massachusetts.

The Progressive delegates reacted defiantly to this recommendation by nominating Roosevelt by acclamation and selecting John M. Parker of Louisiana as his running mate. Roosevelt, however, immediately scotched the enthusiasm of the Progressive delegates by conditionally declining the nomination. Roosevelt informed the convention that he would support Hughes if the latter's positions on major issues were acceptable.

When the Republican convention reconvened the next day, the opposition to Hughes had evaporated. The New Yorker received 949½ of the 987 convention votes on the third ballot, and his nomination was subsequently declared unanimous.

Charles W. Fairbanks of Indiana, vice president under Roosevelt, was the convention's choice to fill out the Republican ticket. Fairbanks won on the first ballot by 863 votes to 108 for former Nebraska senator Elmer J. Burkett.

The Wisconsin delegation again presented its minority platform report, which included planks that denounced "dollar diplomacy" and called for women's suffrage, a referendum before any declaration of war, and constitutional amendments to establish the initiative, referendum, and recall. The minority report was defeated and the majority report was approved by voice vote.

The adopted platform harshly criticized the policies of the Wilson administration. In foreign policy, the Republicans denounced the Wilson government for "shifty expedients" and "phrase making" and promised "strict and honest neutrality." The platform condemned the administration for its intervention in Mexico and noninvolvement in the Philippines. The Republicans also called for a stronger national defense.

The two parties continued to disagree on the tariff issue, with the Republicans criticizing the lower (Democratic-passed) Underwood tariff and arguing for a higher, protective tariff. The Republican platform lauded the party's efforts in passing antitrust and transportation rate regulation, but it criticized the Democrats for harassing business.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1916:

Foreign Policy. We desire peace, the peace of justice and right, and believe in maintaining a strict and honest neutrality between the belligerents in the great war in Europe. We must perform all our duties and insist upon all our rights as neutrals without fear and without favor. We believe that peace and neutrality, as well as the dignity and influence of the United States, cannot be preserved by shifty expedients, by phrase making, by performances in language, or by attitudes ever changing in an effort to secure votes or voters.

National Defense. We must have a Navy so strong and so well proportioned and equipped, so thoroughly ready and prepared, that no enemy can gain command of the sea and effect a landing in force on either our Western or our Eastern coast. To secure these results we must have a coherent continuous policy of national defense, which even in these perilous days the Democratic party has utterly failed to develop, but which we promise to give to the country.

Merchant Marine. We are utterly opposed to the Government ownership of vessels as proposed by the Democratic party, because Government-owned ships, while effectively preventing the development of the American Merchant Marine by private capital, will be entirely unable to provide for the vast volume of American freights and will leave us more helpless than ever in the hard grip of foreign syndicates.

Tariff. The Republican party stands now, as always, in the fullest sense for the policy of tariff protection to American industries and American labor.

Business. The Republican party firmly believes that all who violate the laws in regulation of business, should be individually punished. But prosecution is very different from persecution, and business success, no matter how honestly attained, is apparently regarded by the Democratic party as in itself a crime. Such doctrines and beliefs choke enterprise and stifle prosperity. The Republican party believes in encouraging American business as it believes in and will seek to advance all American interests.

Women's Suffrage. The Republican party, reaffirming its faith in government of the people, by the people, for the people, as a measure of justice to one-half the adult people of this country, favors the extension of the suffrage to women, but recognizes the right of each state to settle this question for itself.

Democrats

The Democratic convention of 1916 was held in St. Louis in mid-June. The delegates were nearly unanimous in their support for President Woodrow Wilson, who was renominated by the vote of 1,092 to 1—the lone dissenting vote coming from an Illinois delegate who disapproved of a motion to nominate Wilson by acclamation. With Wilson's approval, Vice President Thomas R. Marshall was renominated by acclamation.

For the first time in more than two decades, William Jennings Bryan was not a major convention force. Bryan was defeated in his bid to be a delegate-at-large from Nebraska and attended the convention as a reporter. He was invited to address the delegates and echoed the theme stressed by other speakers, that Wilson would keep the nation out of war.

Wilson was the recognized leader of the Democratic Party, but the pacifistic theme, emphasized by Bryan and other convention orators, struck a responsive chord among the delegates that was mildly alarming to Wilson and his managers. They initially had planned to accent the theme of Americanism and national unity.

The wording of the national unity plank was a matter of debate within the platform committee. The Democratic senators from Missouri warned that Wilson's strongly worded plank might offend German-American citizens. Nonetheless, the Wilson plank was retained and placed prominently near the beginning of the platform.

The only section of the platform brought to a floor vote was the plank on women's suffrage. The majority plank favored extending the vote to women, while a minority plank advocated leaving the matter to the individual states. The minority plank was defeated, 888½ to 181½. The rest of the platform was then adopted by a voice vote. The Democratic position on women's suffrage contrasted with that of the Republicans, who proposed leaving the matter up to the individual states. (Table, p. 709.)

The platform's inclusion of national unity and military preparedness planks was a contrast with earlier Democratic platforms around the turn of the century, which had consistently denounced imperialism and denied the need for a stronger military. Even though spurred by the war in Europe, the new planks were a notable change.

The rest of the platform focused on the progressive reforms of the Wilson administration, particularly in tariffs, banking, labor, and agriculture. Wilson himself was lauded as "the greatest American of his generation."

Noticeably absent from the platform were two planks in the party's document four years earlier: a call for a single-term presidency and a defense of states' rights.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1916:

National Unity. In this day of test, America must show itself not a nation of partisans but a nation of patriots. There is gathered here in America the best of the blood, the industry and the genius of the whole world, the elements of a great race and a magnificent society to be welded into a mighty and splendid Nation. Whoever, actuated by the purpose to promote the industry of a foreign power, in disregard of our own country's welfare or to injure this government in its foreign relations or cripple or destroy its industries at home, and whoever by arousing prejudices of a racial, religious or other nature creates discord and strife among our people so as to obstruct the wholesome process of unification, is faithless to the trust which the privileges of citizenship repose in him and is disloyal to his country.

Military Preparedness. We therefore favor the maintenance of an army fully adequate to the requirements of order, of safety, and of the protection of the nation's rights, the fullest development of modern methods of seacoast defence and the maintenance of an adequate reserve of citizens trained to arms and prepared to safeguard the people and territory of the United States against any danger of hostile action which may unexpectedly arise; and a fixed policy for the continuous development of a navy, worthy to support the great naval traditions of the United States and fully equal to the international tasks which this Nation hopes and expects to take a part in performing.

Tariff. We reaffirm our belief in the doctrine of a tariff for the purpose of providing sufficient revenue for the operation of the government economically administered, and unreservedly endorse the Underwood tariff law as truly exemplifying that doctrine.

Women's Suffrage. We recommend the extension of the franchise to the women of the country by the States upon the same terms as to men.

Socialists

The Socialists did not hold a convention in 1916 but did nominate candidates and adopt a platform. The candidates were chosen in a unique mail referendum. With Eugene V. Debs's refusal to run, the presidential nomination went to Allan L. Benson of New York. George R. Kirkpatrick of New Jersey was selected as his running mate.

More than half of the Socialist platform was devoted to criticizing the U.S. preparations for war. The Socialists opposed the war in Europe and viewed the American drive for preparedness as an effort by ruling capitalists to protect the system and their profits.

The Socialist platform specifically advocated no increase in military appropriations, a national referendum on any declaration of war, the shifting of the power to make foreign policy from the president to Congress, the abandonment of the Monroe Doctrine and immediate independence for the Philippines.

The rest of the platform was divided into sections entitled political demands, industrial demands, and collective ownership. The proposals in these sections paralleled earlier Socialist platforms, although there was a new plank, advocating lending by the federal government to local governments, which was an early expression of the concept of revenue-sharing.

Following are excerpts from the Socialist platform of 1916:

Militarism and Preparedness. The working class must recognize militarism as the greatest menace to all efforts toward industrial freedom, and regardless of political or industrial affiliations must present a united front in the fight against preparedness and militarism.... The war in Europe, which diminished and is still diminishing the remote possibility of European attack upon the United States, was nevertheless seized upon by capitalists and by unscrupulous politicians as a means of spreading fear throughout the country, to the end that, by false pretenses, great military establishments might be obtained. We denounce such "preparedness" as both false in principle, unnecessary in character and dangerous in its plain tendencies toward militarism.

Foreign Policy. We, therefore, demand that the power to fix foreign policies and conduct diplomatic negotiations shall be lodged in congress and shall be exercised publicly, the people reserving the right to order congress, at any time, to change its foreign policy.

Referendum on War. That no war shall be declared or waged by the United States without a referendum vote of the entire people, except for the purpose of repelling invasion.

Federal Loans to Local Governments. The government shall lend money on bonds to counties and municipalities at a nominal rate of interest for the purpose of taking over or establishing public utilities and for building or maintaining public roads or highways and public schools.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Socialist

Warren G. Harding
Republican

James M. Cox
Democrat

Socialists

The Socialists held their convention in New York in May and for the fifth time nominated Eugene V. Debs of Indiana for president. It was one of the strangest candidacies in American political history, because at the time Debs was serving a ten-year prison term in the Atlanta federal penitentiary for his outspoken opposition to the American war effort. Seymour Stedman of Ohio was chosen as his running mate.

The Socialist platform was again a distinctive document, going far beyond the platforms of the two major parties in the radical nature of the reforms proposed. The platform characterized the war policies and peace proposals of the Wilson administration as “despotism, reaction and oppression unsurpassed in the annals of the republic.” It called for the replacement of the “mischievous” League of Nations with an international parliament. It favored recognition of both the newly established Irish Republic and the Soviet Union.

The Socialists continued to advocate extensive tax reform and included new calls for a tax on unused land and a progressive property tax on wartime profits that would help pay off government debts. The platform warned that the continuing militaristic mood of both major parties could lead to another war.

The Socialists continued to recommend extensive labor benefits, but for the first time they specifically mentioned migratory workers as needing government assistance.

Following are excerpts from the Socialist platform of 1920:

League of Nations. The Government of the United States should initiate a movement to dissolve the mischievous organization called the “League of Nations” and to create an international parliament, composed of democratically elected representatives of all nations of the world based upon the recognition of their equal rights, the principles of self determination, the right to national existence of colonies and other dependencies, freedom of international trade and trade routes by land and sea, and universal disarmament, and be charged with revising the Treaty of Peace on the principles of justice and conciliation.

Labor. Congress should enact effective laws to abolish child labor, to fix minimum wages, based on an ascertained cost of a decent standard of life, to protect migratory and unemployed workers from oppression, to abolish detective and strike-breaking agencies and to establish a shorter work-day in keeping with increased industrial productivity.

African Americans. Congress should enforce the provisions of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments with reference to the Negroes, and effective federal legislation should be enacted to secure the Negroes full civil, political, industrial and educational rights.

Republicans

In mid-June, Republicans met for the fifth straight time in Chicago for their quadrennial convention. For the first time, women were on the floor in large numbers as delegates. With the constitutional amendment granting women the vote on the verge of passage, Republicans, especially in the Midwest and West, were quick to include women in their delegations.

The Republicans, as did the Democrats two weeks later, entered their convention with no clear front-runner for the presidential nomination. Three candidates were at the top of the list, but two of them, Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood of New Hampshire and Sen. Hiram Johnson of California, split the party's progressive wing, while the third entry, Gov. Frank Lowden of Illinois, ran poorly in the presidential primaries and was accused of campaign spending irregularities.

The names of eleven men were placed in nomination for the presidency, but none came close during the first day of balloting to the 493 votes needed to nominate. Wood led on the initial roll call with 287½ votes, trailed by Lowden with 211½ and Johnson with 133½. Sen. Warren G. Harding of Ohio, who had not campaigned for the nomination as extensively as the three pacesetters, placed sixth with 65½ votes. Wood, Lowden, and Johnson all gained strength during the first three ballots. (Table, p. 710.)

After the third roll call, the Johnson delegates moved for adjournment but were defeated, 701½ to 275½. On the fourth ballot, Wood's vote total rose to 314½, well short of a majority but the highest mark attained yet by any candidate. At this point, Harding stood in fifth place with 61½ votes. Although a motion to adjourn had been soundly defeated after the previous roll call, the permanent chairman, Sen. Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts, entertained a new motion to adjourn and declared it passed on a closely divided voice vote.

The adjournment gave Republican leaders a chance to confer and discuss the various presidential possibilities. Much is made in history books about Harding's selection that night in the legendary "smoke-filled room," when Harding was allegedly interviewed at two o'clock by Republican leaders and, answering their questions satisfactorily, was chosen as the nominee. The authenticity of the meeting has been questioned, as has the power of the politicians who made the designation. But, nonetheless, it was clear that Harding was a viable compromise choice who was both acceptable to the conservative party leadership and could be nominated by the delegates.

Harding's vote total rose slowly in the next day's balloting until the ninth ballot, when a large shift, primarily of Lowden delegates, boosted the Ohio senator's vote from 133 to 374½. This was the highest total for any candidate to this point and started a bandwagon that produced Harding's nomination on the tenth ballot. After the various switches, the final vote stood: Harding, 692 ⅓; Wood, 156, and Johnson, 80 ⅔, with the rest of the vote scattered.

Immediately after Harding's nomination, the vice-presidential balloting began. After the nomination of Sen. Irvine L. Lenroot of Wisconsin, a delegate from Oregon rose and, standing on his chair, nominated Gov. Calvin Coolidge of Massachusetts. An enthusiastic demonstration followed, showing the wide delegate support for Coolidge. The governor, who had risen to national prominence less than a year earlier with his handling of a Boston police strike, was a runaway winner on the one vice-presidential ballot. Coolidge received 674½ votes to Lenroot's 146½.

The Wisconsin delegation again presented a detailed minority report to the platform. It included planks that opposed entry into the League of Nations under the terms of the proposed treaty, objected to compulsory military service, called for the quick conclusion of peace negotiations and normalization of foreign relations and recommended a bonus for servicemen to match the wages of wartime civilian workers.

In domestic reforms, the Wisconsin report advocated the election of federal judges and the passage of a constitutional amendment that would establish the initiative, referendum, and recall. The entire minority report was rejected by a voice vote, and the platform as written was adopted in a similar manner.

The platform began by denouncing the Wilson administration for being completely unprepared for both war and peace. It went on to criticize Wilson for establishing an "executive autocracy" by arrogating to himself power that belonged to other branches of government.

The platform included a League of Nations plank that intentionally straddled the controversial issue, applauding the Republican-controlled Senate for defeating Wilson's League but pledging the party "to such agreements with the other nations of the world as shall meet the full duty of America to civilization and humanity."

To help cut federal spending, the Republicans favored consolidating some departments and bureaus and establishing an executive budget.

Both parties continued to differ on the tariff, with the Democrats reiterating their belief in a revenue tariff and the Republicans restating their support of a protective tariff.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1920:

League of Nations. The Republican party stands for agreement among the nations to preserve the peace of the world....

The covenant signed by the President at Paris failed signally ... and contains stipulations, not only intolerable for an independent people, but certain to produce the injustice, hostility and controversy among nations which it proposed to prevent.

[W]e pledge the coming Republican administration to such agreements with the other nations of the world as shall meet the full duty of America to civilization and humanity, in accordance with American ideals, and without surrendering the right of the American people to exercise its judgment and its power in favor of justice and peace.

Democrats

San Francisco was the host city for the 1920 Democratic convention, marking the first time a convention of one of the major parties was held west of the Rockies. Not only was the site a new one, but when the convention opened in late June, for the first time in a generation the Democratic Party had no recognized leader such as Cleveland, Bryan, or Wilson.

President Woodrow Wilson had some hope of a third nomination, but his failing health and skidding popularity made this an unrealistic prospect. But Wilson's refusal to endorse another candidate prevented the emergence of any presidential hopeful as a front-runner for the nomination. In all, twenty-four candidates received votes on the first presidential roll call, but none approached the 729 votes needed for nomination. William Gibbs McAdoo, Wilson's son-in-law and former Treasury secretary, led with 266 votes, in spite of having withdrawn from the race several days before the convention began. Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, famed for his efforts during the "Red Scare," followed closely with 254 votes. Two governors, Ohio's James M. Cox and New York's Alfred E. Smith, trailed with 134 and 109 votes, respectively. (Table, p. 711.)

Another ballot was taken before evening adjournment, with the top four candidates retaining the same order and nearly the same vote.

During the next day's balloting, Cox gained steadily and passed both McAdoo and Palmer. When the majority of McAdoo and Palmer delegates successfully carried a motion to recess after the sixteenth ballot, Cox held the lead with 454½ votes. McAdoo was next with 337 votes and Palmer trailed with 164½.

Six more ballots were taken during the evening session, and although Cox's lead narrowed, he still led McAdoo after the 22nd ballot, 430 to 372½. In the next day's balloting, McAdoo gradually gained ground until he finally passed Cox on the 30th ballot, 403½ to 400½. After completion of the roll call, the motion was made to eliminate the lowest candidate on each succeeding ballot until a nominee had been selected. This drastic proposal to shorten the convention was defeated, 812½ to 264.

Balloting continued without interruption through the 36th roll call. McAdoo still led with 399 votes, but his margin over Cox was reduced to 22 votes, and Palmer with 241 votes achieved his highest total since the 11th ballot.

A candidate was finally nominated during the evening session of the convention's third day of presidential balloting. The Palmer revival fizzled quickly, with most of his delegates going to either McAdoo or Cox. The Ohio governor regained the lead on the thirty-ninth ballot, when the majority of the Indiana delegation shifted from McAdoo to Cox. After this roll call, Cox led McAdoo, 468½ to 440, Palmer having slipped to 74. Cox continued to gain, and a last-ditch effort by McAdoo delegates to force an adjournment failed, 637 to 406. Cox's vote total reached 699½ votes on the forty-fourth ballot, and, with victory imminent, a motion was adopted to declare the Ohio governor the unanimous nominee of the convention. (Table, p. 711.)

Cox's choice for the vice-presidential nomination was Franklin D. Roosevelt of New York, the thirty-eight-year-old assistant secretary of the Navy. Roosevelt was nominated by acclamation.

William Jennings Bryan attended the convention and proposed five planks as amendments to the platform. Only his plank endorsing Prohibition, however, was submitted for a roll-call vote, and it was soundly beaten, 929½ to 155½. A counterproposal by a New York delegate, recognizing the legality of the Prohibition amendment to the Constitution but favoring the manufacture of beer and light wines for home use, was also defeated, 724½ to 356. The platform finally adopted did not discuss the Prohibition question.

Bryan's four other planks covered a wide range of issues. He favored establishing a national newspaper, reducing from two-thirds to a simple majority the vote needed to approve treaties in the Senate, expressed opposition to peacetime universal compulsory military training and recommended that interstate companies reveal the difference between the cost and selling price of their products. All four planks were defeated by voice votes.

One other amendment, calling for the recognition of Irish independence, came to the floor for a roll-call vote. It was beaten, 674 to 402½. Included instead was a milder plank sympathizing with the Irish struggle for independence. Subsequently, the delegates approved by voice vote the entire platform as it was first written.

Although the delegates were unwilling to renominate Wilson, the platform was largely devoted to praise of his leadership and legislation passed during his presidency. The platform reflected Wilson's thinking by placing the League of Nations plank prominently at the beginning and supporting the president's call for American membership. The plank did allow for reservations to the treaty, but none that would prevent American participation in the League.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1920:

League of Nations. The Democratic Party favors the League of Nations as the surest, if not the only, practicable means of maintaining the permanent peace of the world and terminating the insufferable burden of great military and naval establishments....

We commend the President for his courage and his high conception of good faith in steadfastly standing for the covenant agreed to by all the associated and allied nations at war with Germany, and we condemn the Republican Senate for its refusal to ratify the treaty merely because it was the product of Democratic statesmanship, thus interposing partisan envy and personal hatred in the way of the peace and renewed prosperity of the world....

We advocate the immediate ratification of the treaty without reservations which would impair its essential integrity, but do not oppose the acceptance of any reservations making clearer or more specific the obligations of the United States to the league associates.

Irish Independence. The great principle of national self-determination has received constant reiteration as one of the chief objectives for which this country entered the war and victory established this principle.

Within the limitations of international comity and usage, this Convention repeats the several previous expressions of the sympathy of the Democratic Party of the United States for the aspirations of Ireland for self-government.

Republicans

The Republicans gathered for their convention in Cleveland, Ohio, in June. For the first time, a convention was broadcast by radio. Also for the first time, Republican Party rules were changed to elect women to the national committee, with one man and one woman to be chosen from each state and territory.

Unlike the Democratic marathon that began two weeks later in New York, there was surface harmony at the Republican convention. President Calvin Coolidge's success in the spring primaries, and his ability to defuse the Teapot Dome corruption issue, eliminated any major opposition. Coolidge was easily nominated on the first ballot, receiving 1,065 votes. Sen. Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin was a distant second with 34 votes, while Sen. Hiram W. Johnson of California collected the remaining 10. (Table, p. 714.)

The vice-presidential nomination was a confused matter. Eight candidates were nominated, and on the first ballot former Illinois governor Frank O. Lowden led with 222 votes. Although Lowden publicly stated that he would not accept the nomination, he received a majority of the vote on the second roll call. A recess was taken to see if Lowden had changed his mind, but when it was certain that he had not the delegates resumed balloting.

On the third roll call, former budget bureau director Charles G. Dawes received 682½ votes to win nomination. Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover was second with 234½ votes.

As was its custom throughout the early twentieth century, the Wisconsin delegation proposed a detailed minority report to the platform. Proposals included government ownership of railroads and water power, an increased excess profits tax, and reduced taxes on individuals with low incomes. The Wisconsin platform was rejected without a roll-call vote.

The platform that was adopted lauded the economy in government shown by the Republican administration and promised a reduction in taxes.

The Democrats and Republicans continued to differ on the tariff issue, with the Republicans again defending the protective tariff. The Ku Klux Klan was not mentioned in the Republican platform, nor was it discussed on the floor. The controversial organization was the subject of a divisive floor fight at the Democratic convention.

The Republican platform criticized the corruption found to exist in the Harding administration, but it also denounced efforts "to besmirch the names of the innocent and undermine the confidence of the people in the government under which they live."

In the area of foreign policy, the Republicans opposed membership in the League of Nations, although favoring participation in the World Court. While applauding the return of peace and reflecting the nation's increasing mood of isolationism, the Republicans opposed cutbacks in the Army and Navy.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1924:

Corruption. We demand the speedy, fearless and impartial prosecution of all wrong doers, without regard for political affiliations; but we declare no greater wrong can be committed against the people than the attempt to destroy their trust in the great body of their public servants. Admitting the deep humiliation which all good citizens share that our public life should have harbored some dishonest men, we assert that these undesirables do not represent the standard of our national integrity.

Taxes. We pledge ourselves to the progressive reduction of taxes of all the people as rapidly as may be done with due regard for the essential expenditures for the government administered with rigid economy and to place our tax system on a sound peace time basis.

League of Nations. This government has definitely refused membership in the league of nations or to assume any obligations under the covenant of the league. On this we stand.

Military. There must be no further weakening of our regular army and we advocate appropriations sufficient to provide for the training of all members of the national guard, the citizens' military training camps, the reserve officers' training camps and the reserves who may offer themselves for service. We pledge ourselves for service. We pledge ourselves to round out and maintain the navy to the full strength provided the United States by the letter and spirit of the limitation of armaments conference.

War Profiteering. [S]hould the United States ever again be called upon to defend itself by arms the president be empowered to draft such material resources and such services as may be required, and to stabilize the prices of services and essential commodities, whether used in actual warfare or private activities.

Republican Philosophy. The prosperity of the American nation rests on the vigor of private initiative which has bred a spirit of independence and self-reliance. The republican party stands now, as always, against all attempts to put the government into business.

American industry should not be compelled to struggle against government competition. The right of the government to regulate, supervise and control public utilities and public interests, we believe, should be strengthened, but we are firmly opposed to the nationalization or government ownership of public utilities.

Democrats

The 1924 Democratic convention in New York's old Madison Square Garden was the longest in American history. From the opening gavel on June 24 through final adjournment on July 10, the convention spanned seventeen days. The reason for the convention's unprecedented length was an almost unbreakable deadlock between the party's rural and urban factions that extended the presidential balloting for a record 103 roll calls. (Table, pp. 712–713.)

Gov. Alfred E. Smith of New York was the candidate of the urban delegates, while William Gibbs McAdoo of California led the rural forces. But beyond any ideological differences between the two candidates was a bitter struggle between the urban and rural wings for control of the party. Smith, a Roman Catholic of Irish ancestry and an opponent of Prohibition and the Ku Klux Klan, embodied characteristics loathed by the rural leaders. McAdoo, a Protestant, a supporter of Prohibition and tolerant of the Ku Klux Klan, was equally unacceptable to the urban forces. Without a strong leader to unite the two factions, and with the two-thirds rule in effect, a long deadlock was inevitable.

Besides Smith and McAdoo, fourteen other candidates were nominated. The most memorable speech was delivered by Franklin D. Roosevelt, who, in nominating Smith, referred to him as "the happy warrior," a description that remained with Smith the rest of his career.

Presidential balloting commenced on Monday, June 30. McAdoo led on the first roll call with 431½ votes, followed by Smith with 241, with 733 votes needed for nomination. Through the week, 77 ballots were taken, but none of the candidates approached the required two-thirds majority. At the end of the week, after the seventy-seventh ballot, McAdoo led with 513 votes; Smith had 367; John W. Davis of New York, the eventual nominee, was a distant third with 76½, an improvement of 45½ votes over his first-ballot total. McAdoo had reached the highest total for any candidate, 530 votes, on the sixty-ninth ballot.

William Jennings Bryan, making his last appearance at a Democratic convention, as a delegate from Florida, was given permission to explain his opposition to Smith during the thirty-eighth ballot. But Bryan's final convention oration was lost in a chorus of boos from the urban forces who found his rural philosophy increasingly objectionable.

After the sixty-sixth ballot, the first of a series of proposals was introduced to break the deadlock. It was recommended that the convention meet in executive session and listen to each of the candidates. This received majority approval, 551 to 538, but a two-thirds majority was needed to change the rules. A second proposal, to invite Smith alone to address the convention, also fell short of the necessary two-thirds, although achieving a majority, 604½ to 473.

After the seventy-third ballot, it was recommended that the lowest vote-getter be dropped after each roll call until only five candidates remained, a proposal to be in effect for one day only. This recommendation was defeated, 589½ to 496. A more drastic motion, to adjourn after the seventy-fifth ballot and reconvene two weeks later in Kansas City, was decisively beaten, 1,007.3 to 82.7. The delegates did agree, however, to have representatives of each candidate hold a conference over the weekend.

Balloting resumed on Monday, July 7, with the seventy-eighth roll call. After the eighty-second ballot, a resolution was passed, 985 to 105, releasing all delegates from their commitments.

McAdoo's vote dropped sharply as the balloting progressed, and for the first time, on the eighty-sixth roll call, Smith passed him, 360 to 353½. A boom for Sen. Samuel M. Ralston of Indiana, which had begun on the eighty-fourth ballot, petered out on the ninety-third roll call when Ralston quit the race. At the time of his withdrawal, Ralston was in third place with 196 ¼ votes.

After the ballot, Roosevelt announced that Smith was willing to withdraw from the race if McAdoo would also. McAdoo rejected this suggestion. McAdoo did regain the lead from Smith on the ninety-fourth ballot, 395 to 364½, but with victory beyond reach, released his delegates after the ninety-ninth ballot.

Davis was the principal beneficiary of the McAdoo withdrawal, moving into second place on the 100th ballot and gaining the lead on the next roll call with 316 votes. Most of Smith's strength moved to Alabama's anti-Klan, anti-Prohibition senator, Oscar W. Underwood, who took second place on the 101st ballot with 229½ votes. Underwood, however, could not keep pace with Davis, who stretched his lead on the next two ballots. After the 103rd ballot, Davis's total stood at 575½ votes to 250½ for the Alabama senator.

Before the next ballot could begin, Iowa switched its vote to Davis, causing other shifts that brought Davis the nomination. After the changes had been recorded, Davis had 844 votes to 102½ for Underwood. The West Virginian's nomination was then declared unanimous.

The core of Davis's vote had come from the rural delegates; urban delegates gave him the necessary votes to win the nomination. After nine days of balloting, the Democrats had a presidential candidate.

The party leadership preferred Gov. Charles W. Bryan of Nebraska, William Jennings Bryan's younger brother, as Davis's running mate. Bryan trailed Tennessee labor leader George L. Berry on the first ballot, 263½ to 238, but vote switches begun by Illinois after the roll call brought Bryan the nomination. After the changes Bryan had 740 votes, barely beyond the two-thirds majority necessary.

The discord evident in the presidential and vice-presidential balloting had its roots in the spirited platform battle that preceded the nominations. The first subject of debate was the League of Nations, with the majority report recommending that American entry be determined by a national referendum. The minority plank argued that this was an unwieldy solution that would put the issue aside. Instead, the minority report favored entry into the League of Nations and World Court without reservation. The minority position was rejected, 742½ to 353½. Nonetheless, the Democrats differed markedly in their position from the Republicans, who flatly opposed membership in the League, although favoring participation in the World Court.

The League of Nations debate proved to be merely a warm-up for the controversial religious liberties plank. The focus of debate was the Ku Klux Klan, which was opposed by name in the minority report but was not mentioned in the majority report. In one of the closest votes in convention history, the minority plank was defeated, 543 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>20</sub> to 543 <sup>7</sup>/<sub>20</sub>. The vote closely followed factional lines, with most rural delegates opposing condemnation of the Klan and urban delegates supporting the minority plank.

The rest of the platform stressed Democratic accomplishments during the Wilson presidency, in contrast to Republican corruption. Democratic links with the common man were emphasized, while the Republicans were denounced as the party of the rich. The Democratic platform advocated increased taxes on the wealthy in contrast to the Republicans, who promised a reduction in taxes.

The Democrats continued to advocate a low tariff that would encourage competition. A plank demanding states' rights appeared in the platform, but there were also calls for government regulation of the anthracite coal industry, federal support of the American merchant marine, and legislation that would restrict and publicize individual campaign contributions.

There were planks favoring a cutback in the American military, a national referendum before any declaration of war (except outright aggression against the United States), and the drafting of resources as well as men during wartime. The antimilitaristic planks were a return to the position the party had held earlier in the twentieth century.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1924:

Republican Corruption. Such are the exigencies of partisan politics that republican leaders are teaching the strange doctrine that public censure should be directed against those who expose crime rather than against criminals who have committed the offenses. If only three cabinet officers out of ten are disgraced, the country is asked to marvel at how many are free from taint. Long boastful that it was the only party "fit to govern," the republican party has proven its inability to govern even itself. It is at war with itself. As an agency of government it has ceased to function.

Income Tax. The income tax was intended as a tax upon wealth. It was not intended to take from the poor any part of the necessities of life. We hold that the fairest tax with which to raise revenue for the federal government is the income tax. We favor a graduated tax upon incomes, so adjusted as to lay the burdens of government upon the taxpayers in proportion to the benefits they enjoy and their ability to pay.

Campaign Contributions. We favor the prohibition of individual contributions, direct and indirect, to the campaign funds of congressmen, senators or presidential candidates, beyond a reasonable sum to be fixed in the law, for both individual contributions and total expenditures, with requirements for full publicity.

States' Rights. We demand that the states of the union shall be preserved in all their vigor and power. They constitute a bulwark against the centralizing and destructive tendencies of the republican party.

Anti-militarism. We demand a strict and sweeping reduction of armaments by land and sea, so that there shall be no competitive military program or naval building. Until international agreements to this end have been made we advocate an army and navy adequate for our national safety....

War is a relic of barbarism and it is justifiable only as a measure of defense.

War Profiteering. In the event of war in which the manpower of the nation is drafted, all other resources should likewise be drafted. This will tend to discourage war by depriving it of its profits.

Progressives

Under the sponsorship of the Conference of Progressive Political Action, representatives of various liberal, labor, and agrarian groups met in Cleveland on July 4 to launch the Progressive Party and ratify the ticket of Wisconsin senator Robert M. La Follette Jr. (who in 1925 was elected to the seat of his late father Robert M. La Follette) for president and Montana senator Burton K. Wheeler for vice president. The conference earlier had designated La Follette as its presidential nominee and had given him the power to choose his running mate. The national ticket of the Progressives crossed party lines, joining a Republican, La Follette, with a Democrat, Wheeler. The ticket was endorsed by the Socialists, who supported the Progressive candidates rather than run a separate national ticket.

In large part the Progressive platform advocated measures that had been proposed earlier by the Populists, Socialists, and Progressives before World War I. The key issue, as viewed by the La Follette Progressives, was “the control of government and industry by private monopoly.” The platform favored the government ownership of railroads and water power, rigid federal control over natural resources, the outlawing of injunctions in labor disputes, a cutback in military spending, tax reform and political reform—including the direct election of the president, a national referendum before a declaration of war (except in cases of invasion), election of federal judges, and congressional power to override the Supreme Court.

Following are excerpts from the Progressive platform of 1924:

Anti-monopoly. The great issue before the American people today is the control of government and industry by private monopoly.

For a generation the people have struggled patiently, in the face of repeated betrayals by successive administrations, to free themselves from this intolerable power which has been undermining representative government.

Through control of government, monopoly has steadily extended its absolute dominion to every basic industry.

In violation of law, monopoly has crushed competition, stifled private initiative and independent enterprise....

The equality of opportunity proclaimed by the Declaration of Independence and asserted and defended by Jefferson and Lincoln as the heritage of every American citizen has been displaced by special privilege for the few, wrested from the government of the many.

Tax Reform. We ... favor a taxation policy providing for immediate reductions upon moderate incomes, large increases in the inheritance tax rates upon large estates to prevent the indefinite accumulation by inheritance of great fortunes in a few hands, taxes upon excess profits to penalize profiteering, and complete publicity, under proper safeguards, of all Federal tax returns.

Court Reform. We favor submitting to the people, for their considerate judgment, a constitutional amendment providing that Congress may by enacting a statute make it effective over a judicial vote.

We favor such amendment to the constitution as may be necessary to provide for the election of all Federal Judges, without party designation, for fixed terms not exceeding ten years, by direct vote of the people.

National Referendums. Over and above constitutions and statutes and greater than all is the supreme sovereignty of the people, and with them should rest the final decision of all great questions of national policy. We favor such amendments to the Federal Constitution as may be necessary to provide for the direct nomination and election of the President, to extend the initiative and referendum to the federal government, and to insure a popular referendum for or against war except in cases of actual invasion.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Alfred E. Smith

Republicans

The Republicans held their convention in Kansas City, Missouri, in mid-June 1928. Nearly a year earlier, President Calvin Coolidge had declared his intention not to seek reelection with a typically brief statement: “I do not choose to run for President in 1928.” While some business leaders hoped that Coolidge would be open to a draft, the taciturn incumbent made no effort to encourage them. The vacuum caused by Coolidge’s absence was quickly filled by Commerce Secretary Herbert Hoover of California, whose success in the spring primaries solidified his position as the front-runner.

Hoover’s strength was evident on the first roll call of the convention, a credentials challenge to eighteen Hoover delegates from Texas. In a vote that revealed candidate strength, the move to unseat the Hoover delegates was defeated, 659½ to 399½. In the presidential balloting that followed, he gained more votes to win the nomination easily on the first ballot. Hoover’s vote total was swelled before the balloting began by the withdrawal of his principal opponent, former Illinois governor Frank O. Lowden, who declared in a letter that he could not accept the party platform’s stand on agriculture. Six names were placed in nomination, but Hoover was a landslide winner, receiving 837 of the 1,089 convention votes. Lowden finished second with 74 votes. (Table, p. 715.)

Sen. Charles Curtis of Kansas was virtually unopposed for the vice-presidential nomination, receiving 1,052 votes. Curtis, whose maternal grandmother was half Kaw Indian, was the first member of a major party ticket of Native American ancestry.

Although Wisconsin’s prominent progressive leader, Robert M. La Follette, had died in 1925, his state’s delegation again presented a minority platform. The report was presented by Sen. Robert M. La Follette Jr., who had taken over his father’s Senate seat. Among the planks of the Wisconsin report were proposals favoring enactment of the McNary-Haugen farm bill, government operation of major water power projects, increased income taxes on the rich, and liberalization of Prohibition. No vote was taken on the Wisconsin proposals.

A resolution favoring repeal of Prohibition was tabled by a voice vote.

A separate agricultural resolution was proposed that advocated the basic provisions of the McNary-Haugen bill (twice vetoed by Coolidge), without mentioning the controversial bill by name. On a roll-call vote, the resolution was defeated, 807 to 277, with support centered in the farm states but with most Hoover delegates voting against it.

The platform as originally written was adopted by a voice vote. The platform promised continued prosperity and government economy. The belief in a protective tariff was reiterated. The document concluded with a plank entitled “home rule,” which expressed the party’s belief in self-reliance and strong local government.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1928:

Tariff. We reaffirm our belief in the protective tariff as a fundamental and essential principle of the economic life of this nation.... However, we realize that there are certain industries which cannot now successfully compete with foreign producers because of lower foreign wages and a lower cost of living abroad, and we pledge the next Republican Congress to an examination and where necessary a revision of these schedules to the end that American labor in these industries may again command the home market, may maintain its standard of living, and may count upon steady employment in its accustomed field.

Outlaw War. We endorse the proposal of the Secretary of State for a multilateral treaty proposed to the principal powers of the world and open to the signatures of all nations, to renounce war as an instrument of national policy and declaring in favor of pacific settlement of international disputes, the first step in outlawing war.

Agriculture. We promise every assistance in the reorganization of the market system on sounder and more economical lines and, where diversification is needed, Government financial assistance during the period of transition.

The Republican Party pledges itself to the enactment of legislation creating a Federal Farm Board clothed with the necessary powers to promote the establishment of a farm marketing system of farmer-owned and controlled stabilization corporations or associations to prevent and control surpluses through orderly distribution....

We favor, without putting the Government into business, the establishment of a Federal system of organization for co-operative and orderly marketing of farm products.

Prohibition. The people through the method provided by the Constitution have written the Eighteenth Amendment into the Constitution. The Republican Party pledges itself and its nominees to the observance and vigorous enforcement of this provision of the Constitution.

Republican Philosophy. There is a real need of restoring the individual and local sense of responsibility and self-reliance; there is a real need for the people once more to grasp the fundamental fact that under our system of government they are expected to solve many problems themselves through their municipal and State governments, and to combat the tendency that is all too common to turn to the Federal Government as the easiest and least burdensome method of lightening their own responsibilities.

Democrats

The Democratic convention was held in late June in Houston, Texas, the first time since 1860 that the party's nominating convention had been conducted in a southern city. The rural and urban wings of the party, which had produced the fiasco in Madison Square Garden four years earlier, wanted no more bloodletting. This explained the acceptance of Houston as the convention site by the urban forces, whose presidential candidate, Gov. Alfred E. Smith of New York, was the front-runner for the nomination. Smith's path to the nomination was largely unobstructed, thanks to the decision of William Gibbs McAdoo not to run. McAdoo, the rural favorite in 1924, feared the possibility of another bitter deadlock that would destroy party unity.

The convention broke with tradition by bypassing politicians and selecting Claude G. Bowers of Indiana, a historian and an editorial writer for the New York World, as temporary chairman.

When it came time for the selection of a presidential candidate, Franklin D. Roosevelt once again placed Smith's name in nomination. On the roll call that followed, the New York governor came within 10 votes of the required two-thirds. Ohio quickly switched 44 of its votes to Smith, and the switch pushed "the happy warrior" over the top. When the vote switches were completed, Smith had received 849  $\frac{1}{6}$  of the 1,100 convention votes. No other candidate's vote had totaled more than 100. Smith became the first Roman Catholic to head a major party presidential ticket. (Table, p. 715.)

Senate minority leader Joseph T. Robinson of Arkansas had little opposition for the vice presidency and was nominated on the first ballot with 914  $\frac{1}{6}$  votes. Sen. Alben W. Barkley of Kentucky finished a distant second with 77 votes. After a vote switch, Robinson had 1,035  $\frac{1}{6}$  votes. As a "dry" Protestant from the South, Robinson balanced the ticket. He was the first southerner to be nominated for national office by either major party since the Civil War.

For the first time since 1912, there were no roll-call votes on amendments to the Democratic platform. A minority plank was introduced calling for the party's complete support of Prohibition, but there was no effort to force a roll-call vote. The platform included a milder Prohibition plank that promised "an honest effort to enforce the eighteenth amendment (Prohibition)." On the surface there was little difference from the Republican plank, which pledged "vigorous enforcement" of Prohibition. But in a telegram read to the convention shortly before its final adjournment, Smith negated the effect of the milder plank by declaring there should be "fundamental changes in the present provisions for national Prohibition." Smith's statement was disappointing to many "dry" delegates and lessened whatever enthusiasm they felt for the New York governor. No other issues were discussed, and the platform as written was approved by a voice vote.

Agriculture, the most depressed part of the economy in the 1920s, received more space in the platform than any other issue. The Democrats opposed federal subsidies to farmers, but they advocated government loans to cooperatives and the creation of a federal farm board that would operate similarly to the Federal Reserve Board. While the Republican platform also favored creation of a farm board, as a whole it called for more initiative by the farmers themselves and less direct government help than did the Democratic platform.

Since the late nineteenth century, Democratic platforms had favored a low tariff. The 1928 tariff plank represented a change, expressing as much interest in ensuring competition and protecting the American wage-earner as in raising revenue. Instead of being consistently low, tariff rates were to be based on the difference between the cost of production in the United States and abroad. As a result of the Democrats' altered stand on the tariff, the positions of the two parties on this issue were the closest they had been in a generation.

The Democrats' 1928 platform did not mention the League of Nations, in contrast to the Republicans, who restated their opposition to the League. Both parties called for maintenance of American military strength until international disarmament agreements could be reached. A section of the Democratic foreign policy plank questioned the extent of presidential power in the area of international affairs. President Coolidge was specifically criticized for authorizing American military intervention in Nicaragua without congressional approval.

An unemployment plank was included in the Democratic platform that proposed the creation of public works jobs in times of economic hardship.

As was the case with most Democratic platforms since the early nineteenth century, there was a defense of states' rights and a plank that recognized education as an area of state responsibility. The Democrats made no mention of civil rights in contrast to the Republicans, who, as in 1920, proposed federal antilynching legislation.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1928:

Prohibition. Speaking for the national Democracy, this convention pledges the party and its nominees to an honest effort to enforce the eighteenth amendment.

Agriculture. Farm relief must rest on the basis of an economic equality of agriculture with other industries. To give this equality a remedy must be found which will include among other things:

(a) Credit aid by loans to co-operatives on at least as favorable a basis as the government aid to the merchant marine.

(b) Creation of a federal farm board to assist the farmer and stock raiser in the marketing of their products, as the Federal Reserve Board has done for the banker and business man.

Presidential War Power. Abolition of the practice of the president of entering into and carrying out agreements with a foreign government, either de facto or de jure, for the protection of such government against revolution or foreign attack, or for the supervision of its internal affairs, when such agreements have not been advised and consented to by the Senate, as provided in the Constitution of the United States, and we condemn the administration for carrying out such an unratified agreement that requires us to use our armed forces in Nicaragua.

Tariff. Duties that will permit effective competition, insure against monopoly and at the same time produce a fair revenue for the support of government. Actual difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, with adequate safeguard for the wage of the American laborer must be the extreme measure of every tariff rate.

Unemployment and Public Works. We favor the adoption by the government, after a study of this subject, of a scientific plan whereby during periods of unemployment appropriations shall be made available for the construction of necessary public works and the lessening, as far as consistent with public interests, of government construction work when labor is generally and satisfactorily employed in private enterprise.

Education. We believe with Jefferson and other founders of the Republic that ignorance is the enemy of freedom and that each state, being responsible for the intellectual and moral qualifications of its citizens and for the expenditure of the moneys collected by taxation for the support of its schools, shall use its sovereign right in all matters pertaining to education.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Norman Thomas
Socialist

Herbert Hoover
Republican

Franklin D. Roosevelt
Democrat

Socialists

The Socialist Party held its convention in Milwaukee, Wis., in May and renominated the same ticket that had represented the party in 1928: Norman Thomas of New York for president and James H. Maurer of Pennsylvania for vice president. Aided by the deepening economic depression, the Socialists received more than 2 percent of the popular vote for the first time since 1920. The party continued to run a national ticket until 1956, but 1932 was the last election in which the Socialists received at least 2 percent of the vote.

By a vote of 117 to 64, the convention adopted a resolution supporting the efforts of the Soviet Union to create a Socialist society. An attempt to oust Morris Hillquit as national chairman of the party was beaten, 108 to 81.

The Socialist platform of 1932 contained a number of proposals that had been set forth in earlier party platforms, such as public ownership of natural resources and the means of transportation and communication, increased taxes on the wealthy, an end to the Supreme Court's power to rule congressional legislation unconstitutional, and a reduction in the size and expenditures of the military.

The platform also advocated United States recognition of the Soviet Union and American entry into the League of Nations. Repeal of Prohibition was recommended, as was the creation of a federal marketing system that would buy and market farm commodities.

To meet the hardship of the Depression, the Socialists listed a series of proposals, which included the expenditure of $10 billion for unemployment relief and public works projects.

Following are excerpts from the Socialist platform of 1932:

Unemployment Relief. 1. A Federal appropriation of $5,000,000,000 for immediate relief for those in need to supplement State and local appropriations.

2. A Federal appropriation of $5,000,000,000 for public works and roads, reforestation, slum clearance, and decent homes for the workers, by the Federal Government, States and cities.

3. Legislation providing for the acquisition of land, buildings, and equipment necessary to put the unemployed to work producing food, fuel, and clothing and for the erection of houses for their own use.

4. The 6-hour day and the 5-day week without reduction of wages.

5. A comprehensive and efficient system of free public employment agencies.

6. A compulsory system of unemployment compensation with adequate benefits, based on contributions by the Government and by employers.

7. Old-age pensions for men and women 60 years of age and over.

8. Health and maternity insurance.

Republicans

As the party in power at the outset of the Great Depression, the Republicans bore the major political blame for the worsening economy. In a subdued mood, the party gathered in Chicago in June 1932 for its national convention.

Republican leaders did not view their electoral prospects optimistically for the fall election, but saw no realistic alternative to President Herbert Hoover.

Hoover was easily if unenthusiastically renominated, receiving 1,126½ of the 1,154 convention votes. The highlight of the presidential balloting was the attempt by former Maryland senator Joseph I. France, who ran in several spring primaries, to gain the rostrum and nominate former president Coolidge. France's dramatic plan, however, was foiled by convention managers, who refused him permission to speak and had him escorted from the hall. (Table, p. 716.)

Vice President Charles Curtis had stiff opposition in his bid for renomination. The incumbent was seriously challenged by Maj. Gen. James G. Harbord of New York and the national commander of the American Legion, Hanford MacNider of Iowa. Curtis was short of a majority after the first ballot, but Pennsylvania quickly shifted its 75 votes to the vice president and this pushed him over the top. With the vote standing at Curtis, 634 1/4; MacNider, 182 3/4, and Harbord, 161 3/4, Curtis's renomination was made unanimous.

The major platform controversy surrounded the Prohibition plank. The majority plank, supported by Hoover, was ambiguous. It called for the enforcement of Prohibition but advocated a national referendum that would permit each state to determine whether or not it wanted Prohibition. A more clear-cut minority plank favored repeal of Prohibition. The minority proposal was defeated, however, 690 19/36 to 460 2/9. Following this roll call, the rest of the platform was approved by a voice vote.

The document approved by the Republicans was the longest in the party's history—nearly 9,000 words. It blamed the nation's continued economic problems on a worldwide depression, but lauded Hoover's leadership in meeting the crisis. The Republicans saw reduced government spending and a balanced budget as keys to ending the Depression. The party platform viewed unemployment relief as a matter for private agencies and local governments to handle.

The Republicans continued their support of a protective tariff. On the agricultural issue, the party proposed acreage controls to help balance supply and demand.

The final plank of the Republican platform urged party members in Congress to demonstrate party loyalty by supporting the Republican program. The plank warned that the party's strength was jeopardized by internal dissent.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1932:

Unemployment Relief. The people themselves, by their own courage, their own patient and resolute effort in the readjustments of their own affairs, can and will work out the cure. It is our task as a party, by leadership and a wise determination of policy, to assist that recovery....

True to American traditions and principles of government, the administration has regarded the relief problem as one of State and local responsibility. The work of local agencies, public and private has been coordinated and enlarged on a nation-wide scale under the leadership of the President.

Government Spending. We urge prompt and drastic reduction of public expenditure and resistance to every appropriation not demonstrably necessary to the performance of government, national or local.

Agriculture. The fundamental problem of American agriculture is the control of production to such volume as will balance supply with demand. In the solution of this problem the cooperative organization of farmers to plan production, and the tariff, to hold the home market for American farmers, are vital elements. A third element equally as vital is the control of the acreage of land under cultivation, as an aid to the efforts of the farmer to balance production.

Prohibition. We ... believe that the people should have an opportunity to pass upon a proposed amendment the provision of which, while retaining in the Federal Government power to preserve the gains already made in dealing with the evils inherent in the liquor traffic, shall allow the States to deal with the problem as their citizens may determine, but subject always to the power of the Federal Government to protect those States where prohibition may exist and safeguard our citizens everywhere from the return of the saloon and attendant abuses.

Democrats

With the nation in the midst of the Depression, the Democratic Party had its best chance for victory since 1912. The delegates assembled in Chicago in late June 1932, confident that the convention's nominee would defeat President Hoover.

Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt of New York entered the convention with a majority of the votes, but was well short of the two-thirds majority needed for nomination. Ironically, his principal opponent was the man he had nominated for the presidency three times, former New York governor Alfred E. Smith.

Roosevelt's strength was tested on several key roll calls before the presidential balloting began. Two of the votes involved credentials challenges to Roosevelt delegations from Louisiana and Minnesota. By a vote of 638 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> to 514 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub>, the delegates seated the Roosevelt forces from Louisiana, headed by Sen. Huey P. Long. By a wider margin of 658 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> to 492 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub>, the convention also seated the Roosevelt delegates from Minnesota. (Table, p. 717.)

After settlement of the credentials cases, the battleground shifted to the selection of the permanent convention chairman. The Roosevelt forces backed Sen. Thomas J. Walsh of Montana, who was recommended by the committee on permanent organization. The Smith and other anti-Roosevelt factions coalesced behind Jouett Shouse of Kansas, chairman of the executive committee of the Democratic National Committee, who was recommended for permanent chairman by the national committee. But by a vote of 626 to 528, the Roosevelt forces won again, and Walsh assumed the gavel as permanent chairman.

The Roosevelt managers considered challenging the two-thirds rule; but, realizing that a bruising fight could alienate some of their delegates, particularly in the South, they dropped the idea. Instead, the report of the rules committee recommended that a change in the two-thirds rule be delayed until the 1936 convention.

The presidential balloting began in the middle of an all-night session. After a motion to adjourn was defeated, 863½ to 281½, the first roll call began at 4:30 a.m. Roosevelt received a clear majority of 666 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> votes on the first ballot, compared with 201 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> for Smith and 90 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> for House Speaker John Nance Garner of Texas. The candidates needed 770 votes for the nomination. (Table, p. 717.)

Roosevelt gained slightly on the second ballot, advancing to 677 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> votes, while Smith dropped to 194 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> and Garner remained constant. Of side interest was the shift of Oklahoma's votes from its governor to Will Rogers, the state's famous humorist.

There were few changes on the next roll call, and at 9:15 a.m. the delegates agreed to adjourn. The vote totals after three ballots: Roosevelt, 682.79; Smith, 190 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub>; Garner, 101 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub>.

When balloting resumed the next evening, William Gibbs McAdoo of California quickly launched the bandwagon for Roosevelt by announcing that his state's 44 votes were switching from Garner to the New York governor. Other states followed California's lead, and when the fourth ballot was completed Roosevelt had 945 votes and the nomination. With the Smith vote holding at 190½, no effort was made to make the nomination unanimous.

Although it is not clear whether there was a formal deal struck before the fourth ballot between the Garner and Roosevelt forces, the Texas representative was the unanimous choice of the convention for vice president. Forty states seconded his nomination, and no roll call was taken.

In an effort to break what he described as "absurd traditions," Roosevelt flew from Albany to Chicago to accept the presidential nomination personally. (Previously, a major party candidate would be formally notified of his nomination in a ceremony several weeks after the convention.) In his speech of acceptance, Roosevelt struck a liberal tone and issued his memorable pledge of "a new deal for the American people."

The platform adopted by the convention was not a blueprint for the New Deal to follow. It was fewer than 2,000 words long, the party's shortest platform since 1888, and less than one-fourth as long as the document adopted by the Republicans. It blamed the Depression on the "disastrous policies" practiced by the Republicans but made few new proposals, instead forcefully restating positions that had appeared in earlier party platforms.

The Democrats advocated a balanced budget with a cut of at least 25 percent in federal spending and called for removal of the federal government from competition with private enterprise in all areas except public works and natural resources.

The Democratic platform, unlike its Republican counterpart, advocated extensive unemployment relief and public works projects, regulation of holding companies and securities exchanges, “a competitive tariff for revenue,” and the extension of farm cooperatives.

The plank that sparked the most enthusiasm among the delegates was the call for the repeal of Prohibition. A milder plank favored by “dry” delegates was resoundingly defeated, 934 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub> to 213 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub>.

The only measure added from the floor of the convention favored “continuous responsibility of government for human welfare, especially for the protection of children.” It was approved by a standing vote.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1932:

Government Spending. We advocate an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance to accomplish a saving of not less than twenty-five percent in the cost of the Federal Government. And we call upon the Democratic Party in the states to make a zealous effort to achieve a proportionate result.

We favor maintenance of the national credit by a federal budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

Unemployment Relief, Public Works Projects. We advocate the extension of federal credit to the states to provide unemployment relief wherever the diminishing resources of the states makes it impossible for them to provide for the needy; expansion of the federal program of necessary and useful construction effected with a public interest, such as adequate flood control and waterways.

We advocate the spread of employment by a substantial reduction in the hours of labor, the encouragement of the shorter week by applying that principle in government service; we advocate advance planning of public works.

We advocate unemployment and old-age insurance under state laws.

Prohibition. We advocate the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. To effect such repeal we demand that the Congress immediately propose a Constitutional Amendment to truly represent [sic] the conventions in the states called to act solely on that proposal; we urge the enactment of such measures by the several states as will actually promote temperance, effectively prevent the return of the saloon, and bring the liquor traffic into the open under complete supervision and control by the states.

Agriculture. Extension and development of the Farm Cooperative movement and effective control of crop surpluses so that our farmers may have the full benefit of the domestic market.

The enactment of every constitutional measure that will aid the farmers to receive for their basic farm commodities prices in excess of cost.

Republicans

The Republican convention, held in Cleveland in early June, was an unusually harmonious gathering for a party out of power. There were only two roll-call votes on the convention floor, for president and vice president, and both were one-sided.

The only matter of debate was the vote allocation for Alaska, Hawaii, and the District of Columbia. By a voice vote, the convention approved the minority report of the rules committee, which sliced the vote for these three from six to three votes apiece.

Former president Herbert Hoover received an enthusiastic reception when he spoke, but by that time Kansas governor Alfred M. Landon had the presidential nomination sewed up. Landon, one of the few Republican governors to be reelected during the Depression, received 984 votes on the first ballot, compared with 19 for Sen. William E. Borah of Idaho. (Table, p. 718.)

Before the balloting began, Landon had sent a telegram to the convention that expressed his agreement with the “word and spirit” of the party platform but elaborated his position on several points. The Kansan advocated the passage of a constitutional amendment to ensure women and children safe working conditions and to establish guidelines for wages and hours in the event that legislation passed by Congress was ruled unconstitutional. Landon’s message also proposed extending the civil service to include all workers in federal departments and agencies below the rank of assistant secretary, and it defined “sound currency” as currency that could be exchanged for gold. Landon’s pronouncements were met with thirty minutes of cheering.

For vice president, the convention selected Col. Frank Knox of Illinois, publisher of the Chicago Daily News. Knox, who earlier had campaigned energetically, if not successfully, for the presidential nomination, received all 1,003 votes on the first ballot.

The Republican platform, which began with the sentence, “America is in peril,” focused on the alleged threat of New Deal policies to American constitutional government. The platform assailed the Roosevelt administration for “dishonoring American traditions” and promised to protect local self-government and the power of the Supreme Court.

The Republicans promised a balanced budget, reduced federal expenditures, a “sound currency,” a more discriminating public works program, and the administration of unemployment relief by “non-political local agencies” that would be financed jointly by the various states and the federal government.

The Republicans shared with the Democrats the belief in an isolationist foreign policy and the concepts of social security, unemployment insurance, and crop control.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1936:

Roosevelt’s “New Deal.” America is in peril. The welfare of American men and women and the future of our youth are at stake. We dedicate ourselves to the preservation of their political liberty, their individual opportunity and their character as free citizens, which today for the first time are threatened by Government itself....

The powers of Congress have been usurped by the President.

The integrity and authority of the Supreme Court have been flouted.

The rights and liberties of American citizens have been violated.

Regulated monopoly has displaced free enterprise.

The New Deal Administration constantly seeks to usurp the rights reserved to the States and to the people.

Unemployment Relief. The return of responsibility for relief administration to nonpolitical local agencies familiar with community problems....

Undertaking of Federal public works only on their merits and separate from the administration of relief.

Government Spending, Currency. Balance the budget—not by increasing taxes but by cutting expenditures, drastically and immediately....

We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards.

The first requisite to a sound and stable currency is a balanced budget.

Foreign Policy. We pledge ourselves to promote and maintain peace by all honorable means not leading to foreign alliances or political commitments.

Obedient to the traditional foreign policy of America and to the repeatedly expressed will of the American people, we pledge that America shall not become a member of the League of Nations nor of the World Court nor shall America take on any entangling alliances in foreign affairs.

Democrats

The 1936 Democratic convention, held in Philadelphia in late June, was one of the most harmonious in party history. There were no floor debates, and, for the first time since 1840, there were no roll-call votes.

The only matter that required discussion—elimination of the century-old two-thirds rule—was settled in the rules committee. There, by a vote of 36 to 13, the committee agreed to abrogate the rule, which had been a controversial part of Democratic conventions since 1832. To mollify the South, which was particularly threatened by elimination of the two-thirds rule, the rules committee added a provision that would include consideration of a state’s Democratic voting strength in determining its future convention vote allocation. The rules committee report was approved by a voice vote.

Both President Franklin D. Roosevelt and Vice President John Nance Garner were renominated by acclamation, but more than a full day of oratory was expended in eulogizing the Democratic standard-bearers. Roosevelt was seconded by delegates from each of the states and territories—more than fifty separate speakers. Seventeen delegates spoke on behalf of Garner.

Both Roosevelt and Garner personally accepted their nominations in ceremonies at the University of Pennsylvania’s Franklin Field. Before a crowd estimated to be as large as 100,000, Roosevelt electrified his listeners with a speech that blasted his adversaries among the rich as “economic royalists” and included the sentence: “This generation of Americans has a rendezvous with destiny.”

As in 1932 the platform adopted by the Democrats was a short one, about 3,000 words. The document paid lip service to the concept of a balanced budget and reduced government spending, but it supported continuation of the extensive federal programs undertaken by the Roosevelt administration.

The platform did not, as many in past years had, mention states' rights; this reflected the party's changing view toward federal power. To counter what was viewed as obstructionism by the Supreme Court, the Democrats suggested the possibility of passing a "clarifying amendment" to the Constitution that would enable Congress and state legislatures to enact bills without the fear of an unfavorable decision from the Supreme Court.

The foreign policy plank recognized the isolationist mood of the period, calling for neutrality in foreign disputes and the avoidance of international commitments that would draw the United States into war.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1936:

Federal Power. The Republican platform proposes to meet many pressing national problems solely by action of the separate States. We know that drought, dust storms, floods, minimum wages, maximum hours, child labor, and working conditions in industry, monopolistic and unfair business practices cannot be adequately handled exclusively by 48 separate State legislatures, 48 separate State administrations, and 48 separate State courts. Transactions and activities which inevitably overflow State boundaries call for both State and Federal treatment.

We have sought and will continue to seek to meet these problems through legislation within the Constitution.

If these problems cannot be effectively solved by legislation within the Constitution, we shall seek such clarifying amendment as will assure to the legislatures of the several States and to the Congress of the United States, each within its proper jurisdiction, the power to enact those laws which the State and Federal legislatures, within their respective spheres, shall find necessary, in order adequately to regulate commerce, protect public health and safety and safeguard economic security. Thus we propose to maintain the letter and spirit of the Constitution.

Government Spending. We are determined to reduce the expenses of government. We are being aided therein by the recession in unemployment. As the requirements of relief decline and national income advances, an increasing percentage of Federal expenditures can and will be met from current revenues, secured from taxes levied in accordance with ability to pay. Our retrenchment, tax and recovery programs thus reflect our firm determination to achieve a balanced budget and the reduction of the national debt at the earliest possible moment.

Foreign Policy. We reaffirm our opposition to war as an instrument of national policy, and declare that disputes between nations should be settled by peaceful means. We shall continue to observe a true neutrality in the disputes of others; to be prepared resolutely to resist aggression against ourselves; to work for peace and to take the profits out of war; to guard against being drawn, by political commitments, international banking or private trading, into any war which may develop anywhere.

Union Party

With the support of Father Charles E. Coughlin and his National Union for Social Justice, on June 19, 1936, Rep. William Lemke of North Dakota, a Republican, declared his presidential candidacy on the newly formed Union Party ticket. Thomas O'Brien, a Boston railroad union lawyer, was announced as Lemke's running mate. The fledgling political organization had a brief existence, running a national ticket only in the 1936 election.

The Union Party was basically an extension of Coughlin's organization, and the Lemke-O'Brien ticket was endorsed at the National Union for Social Justice convention in August by a vote of 8,152 to 1.

The Union Party platform reportedly was written by Coughlin, Lemke, and O'Brien at the Roman Catholic priest's church in Royal Oak, Michigan. It was a brief document, fewer than 1,000 words, that contained fifteen points similar to the sixteen-point program favored by Coughlin's National Union. The primary distinctions between the Union Party and the two major parties were in currency expansion, civil service reform, and restrictions on wealth. The Union Party called for the creation of a central bank, regulated by Congress, that would issue currency to help pay off the federal debt and refinance agricultural and home mortgage indebtedness. The Union Party platform also proposed extending the civil service to all levels of the federal government and advocated placing restrictions on annual individual income coupled with a ceiling on gifts and inheritances. The new party differed from the Socialists by emphasizing that private property should not be confiscated.

Following are excerpts from the Union Party platform of 1936:

Currency Expansion. Congress and Congress alone shall coin and issue the currency and regulate the value of all money and credit in the United States through a central bank of issue.

Immediately following the establishment of the central bank of issue Congress shall provide for the retirement of all tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the Federal Government and shall refinance all the present agricultural mortgage indebtedness for the farmer and all the home mortgage indebtedness for the farmer and all the home mortgage indebtedness for the city owner by the use of its money and credit which it now gives to the private bankers.

Civil Service Reform. Congress shall so legislate that all Federal offices and positions of every nature shall be distributed through civil-service qualifications and not through a system of party spoils and corrupt patronage.

Restrictions on Wealth. Congress shall set a limitation upon the net income of any individual in any one year and a limitation of the amount that such an individual may receive as a gift or as an inheritance, which limitation shall be executed through taxation.

Foreign Policy. Congress shall establish an adequate and perfect defense for our country from foreign aggression either by air, by land, or by sea, but with the understanding that our naval, air, and military forces must not be used under any consideration in foreign fields or in foreign waters either alone or in conjunction with any foreign power. If there must be conscription, there shall be a conscription of wealth as well as a conscription of men.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Wendell L. Willkie
Republican

Franklin D. Roosevelt
Democrat

Republicans

The Republican convention was held in Philadelphia in late June, and it was the culmination of one of the most successful of all campaign blitzes. Wendell L. Willkie, an Indiana native who had never before run for public office, was nominated by the Republicans to run for president. A Democrat until 1938, Willkie had gained fame as a defender of private enterprise in opposition to Roosevelt's public power projects. Although Willkie had broad personal appeal, he and his well-financed group of political "amateurs" did not launch their presidential bid until late spring and missed the presidential primaries. Willkie's momentum came from his rapid rise in the Republican preference polls, as he soared from only 3 percent in early May to 29 percent six weeks later.

At the Republican convention, ten names were placed in nomination for the presidency. Willkie's principal rivals were Manhattan District Attorney Thomas E. Dewey, making his first presidential bid at age thirty-eight, and Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio. On the first ballot, Dewey led with 360 votes, followed by Taft with 189, and Willkie with 105. For nomination 501 votes were needed. (Table, p. 719.)

After the first roll call, Dewey steadily lost strength, while Willkie and Taft gained. Willkie assumed the lead on the fourth ballot, passing both Dewey and Taft. Willkie's vote was 306, while Taft moved into second place with 254. Dewey dropped to third with 250.

On the fifth ballot, the contest narrowed to just Willkie and Taft, as both candidates continued to gain—Willkie jumping to 429 votes and Taft to 377. The shift of Michigan's votes to Willkie on the sixth ballot started a bandwagon for the Indianan that pushed him over the top. When the roll call was completed, Willkie was nominated with 655 votes, and a motion to make his nomination unanimous was adopted.

As his running mate, Willkie favored Senate minority leader Charles L. McNary of Oregon. McNary, a supporter of some New Deal measures, was opposed by Rep. Dewey Short of Missouri, a vocal anti-New Dealer. McNary, however, was able to win easily on a single ballot, receiving 890 votes to 108 for Short.

The Republican platform was adopted without debate, although an Illinois member of the platform committee commented that his state would have preferred a stronger antiwar plank. As it was, the Republican foreign policy plank sharply criticized the Roosevelt administration for not adequately preparing the nation's defense. However, the rest of the plank was similar to the one adopted three weeks later by the Democrats at the convention: opposing involvement in war but stressing national defense, and advocating aid to the Allies that would not be "inconsistent with the requirements of our own national defense."

In domestic affairs, the Republicans lambasted the extension of federal power under the New Deal and promised cuts in government spending and the reduction of federal competition with private enterprise. The Republican platform agreed with the concept of unemployment relief and Social Security initiated by the Roosevelt administration, but it proposed the administration of these programs by the states and not the federal government.

The Republicans attacked Roosevelt's monetary measures and advocated currency reforms that included congressional control.

The platform also proposed new amendments to the Constitution that would provide equal rights for men and women and would limit a president to two terms in office.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1940:

Foreign Policy. The Republican Party is firmly opposed to involving this Nation in foreign war....

The Republican Party stands for Americanism, preparedness and peace. We accordingly fasten upon the New Deal full responsibility for our unpreparedness and for the consequent danger of involvement in war....

Our sympathies have been profoundly stirred by invasion of unoffending countries and by disaster to nations whole [whose] ideals most closely resemble our own. We favor the extension to all peoples fighting for liberty, or whose liberty is threatened, of such aid as shall not be in violation of international law or inconsistent with the requirements of our own national defense.

Unemployment Relief. We shall remove waste, discrimination, and politics from relief—through administration by the States with federal grants-in-aid on a fair and nonpolitical basis, thus giving the man and woman on relief a larger share of the funds appropriated.

Currency. The Congress should reclaim its constitutional powers over money, and withdraw the President's arbitrary authority to manipulate the currency, establish bimetallism, issue irredeemable paper money, and debase the gold and silver coinage. We shall repeal the Thomas Inflation Amendment of 1933 and the (foreign) Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and take all possible steps to preserve the value of the Government's huge holdings of gold and reintroduce gold into circulation.

Women's Rights. We favor submission by Congress to the States of an amendment to the Constitution providing for equal rights for men and women.

No Third Term. To insure against the overthrow of our American system of government we favor an amendment to the Constitution providing that no person shall be President of the United States for more than two terms.

Democrats

At the time of both major party conventions in the summer of 1940, Hitler's forces were moving quickly and relentlessly across western Europe. International events assumed a major importance in political decisions. President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who gave evidence before 1940 that he would not seek a third term, became increasingly receptive to the idea of a draft as the Democratic convention drew nearer. The threat to American security caused by the brutally successful Nazi military machine, coupled with Roosevelt's inability to find an adequate New Deal-style successor, seemed to spur the president's decision to accept renomination.

The Democratic convention was held in Chicago in mid-July. On the second night of the convention, a message from Roosevelt was read stating that he did not desire to run for reelection and urging the delegates to vote for any candidate they wished. Although worded in a negative way, the message did not shut the door on a draft. The delegates reacted, however, by sitting in stunned silence until a Chicago city official began shouting over the public address system, "We want Roosevelt." The cheerleading galvanized the delegates into an hour-long demonstration.

Presidential balloting was held the next day. Roosevelt won easily on the first roll call, although two members of his administration, Vice President John Nance Garner and Postmaster General James A. Farley of New York, ran against him. Roosevelt received 945 <sup>13</sup>/<sub>30</sub> of the 1,100 votes. Farley had 72 <sup>9</sup>/<sub>10</sub> and Garner had 61. (Table, p. 718.)

While the delegates were satisfied to have Roosevelt at the top of the ticket again, many balked at his choice for vice president, Agriculture Secretary Henry A. Wallace of Iowa. Wallace, a leading liberal in the administration and a former Republican, was particularly distasteful to conservative Democrats. Many delegates were expecting Roosevelt to leave the vice-presidential choice to the convention and were unhappy to have the candidate dictated to them.

It took a personal appearance at the convention by the president's wife, Eleanor Roosevelt, and a threat by the president that he would not accept the presidential nomination without his handpicked running mate, to steer the delegates toward Wallace. In spite of the pressure by the Roosevelt forces, the vote was scattered among thirteen candidates on the vice-presidential ballot. Wallace, though, was able to obtain a slim majority, 626 <sup>11</sup>/<sub>30</sub> votes to 329 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>5</sub> for the runner-up, House Speaker William B. Bankhead of Alabama. Because of the displeasure of many of the delegates, Wallace was asked not to address the convention.

The convention closed by hearing a radio address by Roosevelt, who stated that he had not wanted the nomination but accepted it because the existing world crisis called for personal sacrifice.

The party platform was adopted without a roll call, although there was an amendment presented by a Minnesota representative that opposed any violation of the two-term tradition. It was rejected by a voice vote. The platform as adopted was divided into three sections. The first discussed American military preparedness and foreign policy; the second detailed the New Deal's benefits for various segments of the economy (agriculture, labor, business); the third listed New Deal welfare measures, ranging from unemployment relief to low-cost housing.

As a concession to the party's isolationist wing, the first section contained the administration's promise not to participate in foreign wars or fight in foreign lands, except in case of an attack on the United States. The plank stressed the need of a strong national defense to discourage aggression, but also pledged to provide to free nations (such as Great Britain) material aid "not inconsistent with the interests of our own national self-defense."

An electric power plank was included in the second section of the platform as a direct result of the Republicans' selection of Wendell L. Willkie, a former utilities executive, as their presidential candidate. The Democrats argued in favor of the massive public power projects constructed during the New Deal and criticized private utilities such as the one formerly headed by Willkie.

The third section of the platform drew a sharp distinction from the Republicans on the issue of unemployment relief, opposing any efforts to turn the administration of relief over to the states or local governments.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1940:

Democratic Achievements. Toward the modern fulfillment of the American ideal, the Democratic Party, during the last seven years, has labored successfully:

1. To strengthen democracy by defensive preparedness against aggression, whether by open attack or secret infiltration;
2. To strengthen democracy by increasing our economic efficiency; and

3. To strengthen democracy by improving the welfare of the people.

Foreign Policy. We will not participate in foreign wars, and we will not send our army, naval or air forces to fight in foreign lands outside of the Americas, except in case of attack....

Weakness and unpreparedness invite aggression. We must be so strong that no possible combination of powers would dare to attack us. We propose to provide America with an invincible air force, a navy strong enough to protect all our seacoasts and our national interests, and a fully-equipped and mechanized army.

Unemployment Relief. We shall continue to recognize the obligation of Government to provide work for deserving workers who cannot be absorbed by private industry.

We are opposed to vesting in the states and local authorities the control of Federally-financed work relief. We believe that this Republican proposal is a thinly disguised plan to put the unemployed back on the dole.

Electric Power. The nomination of a utility executive by the Republican Party as its presidential candidate raises squarely the issue, whether the nation's water power shall be used for all the people or for the selfish interests of a few. We accept that issue.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Thomas E. Dewey
Republican

Franklin D. Roosevelt
Democrat

Republicans

For the first time since 1864, the nation was at war during a presidential election year. The Republicans held their convention first, meeting in Chicago in late June 1944. With a minimum of discord, the delegates selected a national ticket and adopted a platform. Gov. Thomas E. Dewey of New York, the front-runner for the presidential nomination, was the nearly unanimous selection when his last two rivals, Gov. John W. Bricker of Ohio and former Minnesota governor Harold E.

Stassen, both withdrew from the race before the roll call. On the single ballot, Dewey received 1,056 of the 1,057 votes cast. The one dissenting vote was cast by a Wisconsin delegate for Gen. Douglas MacArthur. (Table, p. 720.)

As Dewey's running mate, the delegates unanimously selected Gov. Bricker, an isolationist and party regular, who received all 1,057 votes cast. During the nominating speeches, Rep. Charles A. Halleck of Indiana made the unusual move of recommending his state's first choice for vice president, William L. Hutcheson, for secretary of labor.

Dewey came to Chicago personally to accept the nomination, becoming the first Republican presidential candidate to break the tradition of waiting to accept the nomination in a formal notification ceremony. The thrust of Dewey's speech was an attack on the Roosevelt administration, which he referred to as "stubborn men grown old and tired and quarrelsome in office."

The platform was approved without dissent. The international section was written in a guarded tone. It favored "responsible participation by the United States in postwar cooperative organization" but declared that any agreement must be approved by a two-thirds vote of the Senate. The Republicans favored the establishment of a postwar Jewish state in Palestine.

The domestic section of the platform denounced the New Deal's centralization of power in the federal government, with its increased government spending and deficits. The Republicans proposed to stabilize the economy through the encouragement of private enterprise.

The platform restated several of the planks included four years earlier, among which were the call for an equal rights amendment, a two-term limitation on the president, and the return of control over currency matters from the president to Congress.

The Republicans adopted a civil rights plank that called for a congressional investigation of the treatment of African Americans in the military, passage of a constitutional amendment to eliminate the poll tax, and legislation that would outlaw lynching and permanently establish a Fair Employment Practice Commission.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1944:

Postwar International Organization. We favor responsible participation by the United States in post-war cooperative organization among sovereign nations to prevent military aggression and to attain permanent peace with organized justice in a free world.

Such organization should develop effective cooperative means to direct peace forces to prevent or repel military aggression. Pending this, we pledge continuing collaboration with the United Nations to assure these ultimate objectives....

We shall sustain the Constitution of the United States in the attainment of our international aims; and pursuant to the Constitution of the United States any treaty or agreement to attain such aims made on behalf of the United States with any other nation or any association of nations, shall be made only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur.

Israel. In order to give refuge to millions of distressed Jewish men, women and children driven from their homes by tyranny, we call for the opening of Palestine to their unrestricted immigration and land ownership, so that in accordance with the full intent and purpose of the Balfour Declaration of 1917 and the Resolution of a Republican Congress in 1922, Palestine may be constituted as a free and democratic Commonwealth. We condemn the failure of the President to insist that the mandatory of Palestine carry out the provision of the Balfour Declaration and of the mandate while he pretends to support them.

New Deal. Four more years of New Deal policy would centralize all power in the President, and would daily subject every act of every citizen to regulation by his henchmen; and this country could remain a Republic only in name. No problem exists which cannot be solved by American methods. We have no need of either the communistic or the fascist technique.

... The National Administration has become a sprawling, overlapping bureaucracy. It is undermined by executive abuse of power, confused lines of authority, duplication of effort, inadequate fiscal controls, loose personnel practices and an attitude of arrogance previously unknown in our history.

Economy. We reject the theory of restoring prosperity through government spending and deficit financing.

We shall promote the fullest stable employment through private enterprise.

Civil Rights. We pledge an immediate Congressional inquiry to ascertain the extent to which mistreatment, segregation and discrimination against Negroes who are in our armed forces are impairing morale and efficiency, and the adoption of corrective legislation.

We pledge the establishment by Federal legislation of a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission.

The payment of any poll tax should not be a condition of voting in Federal elections and we favor immediate submission of a Constitutional amendment for its abolition.

We favor legislation against lynching and pledge our sincere efforts in behalf of its early enactment.

Agriculture. An American market price to the American farmer and the protection of such price by means of support prices, commodity loans, or a combination thereof, together with such other economic means as will assure an income to agriculture that is fair and equitable in comparison with labor, business and industry. We oppose subsidies as a substitute for fair markets.

Serious study of and search for a sound program of crop insurance with emphasis upon establishing a self-supporting program.

Democrats

President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who four years earlier did not make a final decision about accepting a third nomination until the last moment, clearly stated his intention to run for a fourth term a week before the 1944 convention was to open in Chicago. In a message to Democratic National Chairman Robert E. Hannegan of Missouri released July 11, Roosevelt declared that while he did not desire to run, he would accept renomination reluctantly as a "good soldier."

The early sessions of the convention were highlighted by approval of the rules committee report and settlement of a credentials challenge. The rules committee mandated the national committee to revamp the convention's vote-allocation formula in a way that would take into account Democratic voting strength. This measure was adopted to appease southern delegates, who in 1936 were promised an increased proportion of the convention vote in return for elimination of the two-thirds rule. No action had been taken to implement the pledge in the intervening eight years.

The credentials dispute involved the Texas delegation, which was represented by two competing groups. By a voice vote, the convention agreed to seat both groups.

Vice President Henry A. Wallace enlivened the presidential nominations by appearing before the convention to urge Roosevelt's renomination. Wallace termed the president the "greatest liberal in the history of the U.S." In the balloting that followed, Roosevelt easily defeated Sen. Harry F. Byrd of Virginia, who was supported by some conservative southern delegates unhappy with the domestic legislation favored by the New Deal. The final tally: Roosevelt, 1,086; Byrd, 89; former postmaster general James A. Farley, 1. (Table, p. 720.)

Roosevelt accepted the nomination in a radio address delivered from the San Diego Naval Base, where he had stopped off en route to a wartime conference.

The real drama of the convention, the selection of the vice-presidential nominee, came next. Roosevelt had been ambivalent about the choice of his running mate, encouraging several people to run but not publicly endorsing any of them. The president wrote an ambiguous letter to the convention chairman, which was read to the delegates. Roosevelt stated that if he were a delegate himself he would vote for Wallace's renomination, but that the ultimate choice was the convention's and it must consider the pros and cons of its selection.

In another message, written privately for National Chairman Hannegan, Roosevelt declared that he would be happy to run with either Missouri senator Harry S. Truman or Supreme Court justice William O. Douglas. Most of the party bosses preferred Truman to the more liberal alternatives, Wallace and Douglas. Truman originally was slated to nominate former South Carolina senator and Supreme Court justice James E. Byrnes for vice president. But, spurred by his political advisers, Roosevelt telephoned Truman in Chicago and urged him to accept the nomination. Truman reluctantly agreed.

Roosevelt's final preference for Truman was not publicly announced, and twelve names were placed before the convention. Wallace led on the first roll call with 429½ votes, followed by Truman with 319½. Favorite sons and other hopefuls shared the remaining votes cast.

Truman passed Wallace on the second ballot, 477½ to 473, and, immediately after completion of the roll call, Alabama began the bandwagon for the Missouri senator by switching its votes to him. When all the shifts had been made, Truman was an easy winner with 1,031 votes, while Wallace finished with 105.

The platform adopted by the convention was a short one, only 1,360 words. The first third of the platform lauded the accomplishments of Roosevelt's first three terms. The rest of the document outlined the party's proposals for the future. In foreign affairs, the Democrats advocated the creation of a postwar international organization that would have adequate forces available to prevent future wars. The party also called for U.S. membership in an international court of justice. The Democrats joined their Republican opponents in favoring the establishment of an independent Jewish state in Palestine.

The domestic section of the platform proposed a continuation of New Deal liberalism, with passage of an equal rights amendment for women, price guarantees and crop insurance for farmers, and the establishment of federal aid to education that would be administered by the states.

A minority report concerning foreign policy called for the establishment of an international air force to help keep peace. The proposal was rejected, however, when the platform committee chairman indicated that the existence of an air force was included in the majority report's call for "adequate forces" to be at the disposal of the proposed international organization.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1944:

Postwar International Organizations. That the world may not again be drenched in blood by international outlaws and criminals, we pledge:

To join with the other United Nations in the establishment of an international organization based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the prevention of aggression and the maintenance of international peace and security.

To make all necessary and effective agreements and arrangements through which the nations would maintain adequate forces to meet the needs of preventing war and of making impossible the preparation for war and which would have such forces available for joint action when necessary.

Such organization must be endowed with power to employ armed forces when necessary to prevent aggression and preserve peace.

Israel. We favor the opening of Palestine to unrestricted Jewish immigration and colonization, and such a policy as to result in the establishment there of a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth.

Women's Rights. We favor legislation assuring equal pay for equal work, regardless of sex.

We recommend to Congress the submission of a Constitutional amendment on equal rights for women.

Education. We favor Federal aid to education administered by the states without interference by the Federal Government.

Agriculture. Price guarantees and crop insurance to farmers with all practical steps:

To keep agriculture on a parity with industry and labor.

To foster the success of the small independent farmer.

To aid the home ownership of family-sized farms.

To extend rural electrification and develop broader domestic and foreign markets for agricultural products.

Civil Rights. We believe that racial and religious minorities have the right to live, develop and vote equally with all citizens and share the rights that are guaranteed by our Constitution. Congress should exert its full constitutional powers to protect those rights.

Republicans

The Republican convention was held in Philadelphia in late June. As in 1944, New York governor Thomas E. Dewey entered the convention as the front-runner for the nomination. But unlike four years earlier, when he was virtually handed the nomination, Dewey was contested by several candidates, including Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio and former Minnesota governor Harold E. Stassen.

In all, seven names were placed in nomination, with 548 votes needed to determine a winner. Dewey led on the first roll call with 434 votes, followed by Taft with 224 and Stassen with 157. Each of the other candidates received fewer than 100 votes. (Table, p. 721.)

On the second roll call, Dewey moved closer to the nomination, receiving 515 votes. Taft and Stassen continued to trail, with 274 and 149 votes, respectively. At this point, the anti-Dewey forces requested a recess, which was agreed to by the confident Dewey organization.

Unable to form a coalition that could stop Dewey, all his opponents withdrew before the third ballot. On the subsequent roll call, the New York governor was the unanimous choice of the convention, receiving all 1,094 votes.

Dewey's choice for vice president was California governor Earl Warren, who was nominated by acclamation. Warren had been a favorite-son candidate for the presidency and agreed to take second place on the ticket only after receiving assurances that the responsibilities of the vice presidency would be increased if Dewey were elected.

The Republican platform was adopted without dissent. The wording of the platform was unusually positive for a party out of the White House. The failures of the Truman administration were dismissed in a short paragraph, with the rest of the document praising the accomplishments of the Republican 80th Congress and detailing the party's proposals for the future.

One of the major issues of the 1948 campaign was the controversial Taft-Hartley labor law, a measure supported by the Republicans, but which most Democratic leaders felt should be repealed. The Republicans were silent on national health insurance, and the party's housing position stressed private initiative rather than federal legislation. As in 1944 the Republicans opposed the poll tax and segregation in the military and favored legislation to outlaw lynching.

The Republican platform accepted the concept of a bipartisan foreign policy. Paragraphs were inserted that supported the Marshall Plan for European recovery, the United Nations and recognition of Israel.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1948:

Civil Rights. This right of equal opportunity to work and to advance in life should never be limited in any individual because of race, religion, color, or country of origin. We favor the enactment and just enforcement of such Federal legislation as may be necessary to maintain this right at all times in every part of this Republic....

Lynching or any other form of mob violence anywhere is a disgrace to any civilized state, and we favor the prompt enactment of legislation to end this infamy....

We favor the abolition of the poll tax as a requisite to voting.

We are opposed to the idea of racial segregation in the armed services of the United States.

Housing. Housing can best be supplied and financed by private enterprise; but government can and should encourage the building of better homes at less cost. We recommend

Federal aid to the States for local slum clearance and low-rental housing programs only where there is a need that cannot be met either by private enterprise or by the States and localities.

Labor. Here are some of the accomplishments of this Republican Congress: a sensible reform of the labor law, protecting all rights of Labor while safeguarding the entire community, against those breakdowns in essential industries which endanger the health and livelihood of all....

We pledge continuing study to improve labor-management legislation in the light of experience and changing conditions....

We favor equal pay for equal work regardless of sex.

Internal Security. We pledge a vigorous enforcement of existing laws against Communists and enactment of such new legislation as may be necessary to expose the treasonable activities of Communists and defeat their objective of establishing here a godless dictatorship controlled from abroad.

Foreign Policy. We are proud of the part that Republicans have taken in those limited areas of foreign policy in which they have been permitted to participate. We shall invite the Minority Party to join us under the next Republican Administration in stopping partisan politics at the water's edge.

United Nations. We believe in collective security against aggression and in behalf of justice and freedom. We shall support the United Nations as the world's best hope in this direction, striving to strengthen it and promote its effective evolution and use. The United Nations should progressively establish international law, be freed of any veto in the peaceful settlement of international disputes, and be provided with the armed forces contemplated by the Charter.

Israel. We welcome Israel into the family of nations and take pride in the fact that the Republican Party was the first to call for the establishment of a free and independent Jewish Commonwealth.

Democrats

The Democratic delegates were in a melancholy mood when they gathered in Philadelphia in mid-July 1948. Franklin D. Roosevelt was dead; the Republicans had regained control of Congress in 1947; Roosevelt's successor, Harry S. Truman, appeared unable to stem massive defections of liberals and southern conservatives from the New Deal coalition.

The dissatisfaction of southern delegates with policies of the national party was a prominent feature of the 1948 convention. Although the national committee had been mandated by the 1944 convention to devise a new vote-allocation procedure that would appease the South, the redistribution of votes for the 1948 convention merely added two votes to each of the thirty-six states that backed Roosevelt in the 1944 election. This did not appreciably bolster southern strength.

As the convention progressed, southern displeasure focused on the civil rights issue. The Mississippi delegation included in its credentials resolutions against civil rights that bound the delegation to bolt the convention if a states' rights plank was not included in the platform. The Mississippi resolutions also denied the power of the national convention to require the Democratic Party of Mississippi to support any candidate who favored President Truman's civil rights program or any candidate who failed to denounce that program.

A minority report was introduced that recommended the Mississippi delegation not be seated. This proposal was defeated by a voice vote, and, in the interest of party harmony, no roll-call vote was taken. However, in an unusual move, several delegations, including those of California and New York, asked that they be recorded in favor of the minority report.

Joined by several other southern states, Texas presented a minority proposal to the rules committee report, which favored reestablishment of the two-thirds rule. The minority proposal, however, was beaten by a voice vote.

When the presidential balloting began, the entire Mississippi delegation and thirteen members of the Alabama delegation withdrew in opposition to the convention's stand on civil rights. However, their withdrawal in no way jeopardized the nomination of Truman. Some party leaders had earlier flirted with the possibility of drafting Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower or even Supreme Court justice William O. Douglas. But the lack of interest of these two men in the Democratic nomination left the field clear for Truman.

The incumbent won a clear majority on the first ballot, receiving 926 votes to 266 for Georgia senator Richard B. Russell, who received the votes of more than 90 percent of the remaining southern delegates. Among the states of the Old Confederacy, Truman received only 13 votes, all from North Carolina. After several small vote switches, the final tally stood: Truman, 947½; Russell, 263. (Table, p. 722.)

Veteran Kentucky senator Alben W. Barkley, the convention's keynoter, was nominated by acclamation for vice president.

Truman appeared before the convention to accept the nomination and aroused the dispirited delegates with a lively speech attacking the Republican Congress. Referring to it as the "worst 80th Congress," Truman announced that he would call a special session so that the Republicans could pass the legislation they said they favored in their platform.

The Democratic platform was adopted by a voice vote, after a heated discussion of the civil rights section. As presented to the convention by the platform committee, the plank favored equal rights for all citizens but was couched in generalities such as those in the 1944 plank. Southern delegates wanted a weaker commitment to civil rights, and various southern delegations offered three different amendments.

One, presented by former governor Dan Moody of Texas and signed by fifteen members of the platform committee, was a broadly worded statement that emphasized the power of the states. A second amendment, sponsored by two Tennessee members of the platform committee, was a brief, emphatic statement declaring the rights of the states. The third amendment, introduced by the Mississippi delegation as a substitute for the Moody amendment, specifically listed the powers of the states to maintain segregation. The Moody amendment was beaten, 924 to 310, with nearly all the support limited to the South. The other two amendments were rejected by voice vote. (Table, p. 722.)

Northern liberals countered by proposing to strengthen the civil rights plank. Introduced by former representative Andrew J. Biemiller of Wisconsin and championed by Mayor Hubert H. Humphrey of Minneapolis, the amendment commended Truman's civil rights program and called for congressional action to guarantee equal rights in voting participation, employment opportunity, personal security, and military service. The Biemiller amendment was passed, 651½ to 582½, with delegations from the larger northern states supporting it. Delegations from the South were in solid opposition and were joined by delegates from border and small northern states. (Table, p. 722.)

The rest of the platform lauded Truman's legislative program and blamed the Republican Congress for obstructing beneficial legislation. In the New Deal tradition, the platform advocated the extension of Social Security, raising of the minimum wage, establishment of national health insurance, and the creation of a permanent flexible price support system for farmers. Congress was blamed for obstructing passage of federal aid to education, comprehensive housing legislation, and funding for the Marshall Plan to help rebuild Europe. The Republicans were also criticized for crippling reciprocal trade agreements, passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, and even the rising rate of inflation.

The development of the cold war with the communist world produced a new issue, internal security, on which the two major parties differed sharply. While the Republican position stressed the pursuit of subversives, the Democrats placed more emphasis on the protection of individual rights.

In foreign affairs, the Democratic platform called for the establishment of a United Nations military force, international control of the atomic bomb, and recognition of the state of Israel.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1948:

Civil Rights. We highly commend President Harry S. Truman for his courageous stand on the issue of civil rights.

We call upon the Congress to support our President in guaranteeing these basic and fundamental American Principles: (1) the right of full and equal political participation; (2) the right to equal opportunity of employment; (3) the right of security of person; (4) and the right of equal treatment in the service and defense of our nation.

Housing. We shall enact comprehensive housing legislation, including provisions for slum clearance and low-rent housing projects initiated by local agencies. This nation is shamed by the failure of the Republican 80th Congress to pass the vitally needed general housing legislation as recommended by the President. Adequate housing will end the need for rent control. Until then, it must be continued.

Social Security, Health Insurance. We favor the extension of the Social Security program established under Democratic leadership, to provide additional protection against the hazards of old age, disability, disease or death. We believe that this program should include:

Increases in old-age and survivors' insurance benefits by at least 50 percent, and reduction of the eligibility age for women from 65 to 60 years; extension of old-age and survivors' and unemployment insurance to all workers not now covered; insurance against loss of earnings on account of illness or disability; improved public assistance for the needy.

Labor. We advocate the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. It was enacted by the Republican 80th Congress over the President's veto....

We favor the extension of the coverage of the Fair Labor Standards Act as recommended by President Truman, and the adoption of a minimum wage of at least 75 cents an hour in place of the present obsolete and inadequate minimum of 40 cents an hour.

We favor legislation assuring that the workers of our nation receive equal pay for equal work, regardless of sex.

United Nations. We will continue to lead the way toward curtailment of the use of the veto. We shall favor such amendments and modifications of the charter as experience may justify. We will continue our efforts toward the establishment of an international armed force to aid its authority. We advocate the grant of a loan to the United Nations recommended by the President, but denied by the Republican Congress, for the construction of the United Nations headquarters in this country.

Disarmament. We advocate the effective international control of weapons of mass destruction, including the atomic bomb, and we approve continued and vigorous efforts within the United Nations to bring about the successful consummation of the proposals which our Government has advanced.

Israel. We pledge full recognition to the State of Israel. We affirm our pride that the United States under the leadership of President Truman played a leading role in the adoption of the resolution of November 29, 1947, by the United Nations General Assembly for the creation of a Jewish State.

Internal Security. We shall continue vigorously to enforce the laws against subversive activities, observing at all times the constitutional guarantees which protect free speech, the free press and honest political activity. We shall strengthen our laws against subversion to the full extent necessary, protecting at all times our traditional individual freedoms.

States' Rights (Dixiecrats)

Provoked by the Democratic convention's adoption of a strong civil rights plank, Gov. Fielding L. Wright of Mississippi invited other southern Democrats to meet in Birmingham, Ala., on July 17 to select a regional ticket that would reflect southern views.

It was a disgruntled group that gathered in Birmingham, just three days after the close of the Democratic convention. Placards on the floor of the convention hall identified thirteen states, yet there were no delegates from Georgia, Kentucky, or North Carolina, and Virginia was represented by four University of Virginia students and an Alexandria woman who was returning home from a trip south. Most major southern politicians shied away from the bolters, fearing that involvement would jeopardize their standing with the national party and their seniority in Congress.

Former Alabama governor Frank M. Dixon with a keynote address vocalized the mood of the convention by charging that Truman's civil rights program would "reduce us to the status of a mongrel, inferior race, mixed in blood, our Anglo-Saxon heritage a mockery."

As its standard-bearers, the convention chose Gov. J. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina for president and Gov. Wright for vice president. Thurmond's acceptance speech touched on another grievance of bolting southern Democrats: their decreasing power within the Democratic Party. Thurmond warned: "If the South should vote for Truman this year, we might just as well petition the Government to give us a colonial status."

The platform adopted by the Dixiecrats was barely 1,000 words long, but it forcefully presented the case for states' rights. The platform warned that the tendency toward greater federal power ultimately would establish a totalitarian police state.

The Dixiecrats saved their most vitriolic passages to describe the civil rights plank adopted by the Democratic convention. They declared their support for segregation and charged that the plank adopted by the Democrats was meant "to embarrass and humiliate the South."

The platform also charged the national Democratic Party with ingratitude, claiming that the South had supported the Democratic ticket with "clock-like regularity" for nearly 100 years, but that now the national party was being dominated by states controlled by the Republicans.

Following are excerpts from the States' Rights platform of 1948:

States' Rights. We believe that the protection of the American people against the onward march of totalitarian government requires a faithful observance of Article X of the American Bill of Rights which provides that: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

Civil Rights. We stand for the segregation of the races and the racial integrity of each race; the constitutional right to choose one's associates; to accept private employment without governmental interference, and to earn one's living in any lawful way. We oppose the elimination of segregation employment by Federal bureaucrats called for by the misnamed civil rights program. We favor home rule, local self-government, and a minimum interference with individual rights.

We oppose and condemn the action of the Democratic convention in sponsoring a civil rights program calling for the elimination of segregation, social equality by Federal fiat, regulation of private employment practices, voting and local law enforcement.

We affirm that the effective enforcement of such a program would be utterly destructive of the social, economic and political life of the Southern people, and of other localities in which there may be differences in race, creed or national origin in appreciable numbers.

Progressives

On December 29, 1947, former vice president Henry A. Wallace announced his presidential candidacy at the head of a new liberal party. Officially named the Progressive Party at its convention in Philadelphia in late July 1948, the new party was composed of some liberal Democrats as well as more radical groups and individuals that included some communists.

Nearly 3,200 delegates nominated Wallace for the presidency and Democratic senator Glen H. Taylor of Idaho as his running mate. The colorful Taylor and his family regaled the delegates with their rendition of "When You Were Sweet Sixteen."

On the final night of the convention, 32,000 spectators assembled to hear Wallace deliver his acceptance speech at Shibe Park. The Progressive standard-bearer expressed his belief in "progressive capitalism," which would place "human rights above property rights," and envisioned "a new frontier... across the wilderness of poverty and sickness."

Former Roosevelt associate Rexford G. Tugwell chaired the seventy-four-member platform committee that drafted a detailed platform, about 9,000 words in length, that was adopted by the convention. The platform denounced the two major parties as champions of big business and claimed the new party to be the true "political heirs of Jefferson, Jackson and Lincoln." However, many political observers and opponents of the Progressives dismissed the new party as a Communist-front organization.

Although numerous positions taken by the Progressives in 1948 were considered radical, many were later adopted or seriously considered by the major parties.

The foreign policy plank advocated negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union ultimately leading to a peace agreement, and it sharply criticized the "anti-Soviet hysteria" of the period. The platform called for repeal of the draft, repudiation of the Marshall Plan, worldwide disarmament featuring abolition of the atomic bomb, amnesty for conscientious objectors imprisoned in World War II, recognition and aid to Israel, extension of United Nations humanitarian programs, and the establishment of a world legislature.

In the domestic area, the Progressives opposed internal security legislation, advocated the eighteen-year-old vote, avored the creation of a Department of Culture, called for food stamp and school hot lunch programs, and proposed a federal housing plan that would build 25 million homes in ten years and subsidize low-income housing.

The Progressives also reiterated the proposals of earlier third parties by favoring the direct election of the president and vice president, extensive tax reform, stricter control of monopolies, and the nationalization of the principal means of communication, transportation, and finance.

The Progressives joined the Democrats and Republicans in proposing strong civil rights legislation and an equal rights amendment for women.

Following are excerpts from the Progressive platform of 1948:

Soviet Union. The Progressive Party ... demands negotiation and discussion with the Soviet Union to find areas of agreement to win the peace.

Disarmament. The Progressive Party will work through the United Nations for a world disarmament agreement to outlaw the atomic bomb, bacteriological warfare, and all other instruments of mass destruction; to destroy existing stockpiles of atomic bombs and to establish United Nations controls, including inspection, over the production of atomic energy; and to reduce conventional armaments drastically in accordance with resolutions already passed by the United Nations General Assembly.

World Legislation. The only ultimate alternative to war is the abandonment of the principle of the coercion of sovereignties by sovereignties and the adoption of the principle of the just enforcement upon individuals of world federal law, enacted by a world federal legislature with limited but adequate powers to safeguard the common defense and the general welfare of all mankind.

Draft. The Progressive Party calls for the repeal of the peacetime draft and the rejection of Universal Military Training.

Amnesty. We demand amnesty for conscientious objectors imprisoned in World War II.

Internal Security. We denounce anti-Soviet hysteria as a mask for monopoly, militarism, and reaction....

The Progressive Party will fight for the constitutional rights of Communists and all other political groups to express their views as the first line in the defense of the liberties of a democratic people.

Civil Rights. The Progressive Party condemns segregation and discrimination in all its forms and in all places....

We call for a Presidential proclamation ending segregation and all forms of discrimination in the armed services and Federal employment.

We demand Federal anti-lynch, anti-discrimination, and fair-employment-practices legislation, and legislation abolishing segregation in interstate travel.

We call for immediate passage of anti-poll tax legislation, enactment of a universal suffrage law to permit all citizens to vote in Federal elections, and the full use of Federal enforcement powers to assure free exercise of the right to franchise.

Food Stamps, School Lunches. We also call for assistance to low income consumers through such programs as the food stamp plan and the school hot-lunch program.

Housing. We pledge an attack on the chronic housing shortage and the slums through a long-range program to build 25 million new homes during the next ten years. This program will include public subsidized housing for low-income families.

Nationalization. As a first step, the largest banks, the railroads, the merchant marine, the electric power and gas industry, and industries primarily dependent on government funds or government purchases such as the aircraft, the synthetic rubber and synthetic oil industries must be placed under public ownership.

Youth Vote. We call for the right to vote at eighteen.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Dwight D. Eisenhower
Republican

Adlai E. Stevenson
Democrat

Republicans

For the third straight time, both major parties held their conventions in the same city. In 1952 the site was Chicago; the Republicans met there in early July two weeks before the Democrats. The battle for the presidential nomination pitted the hero of the party's conservative wing, Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio, against the favorite of most moderate and liberal Republicans, Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower. The general, a Texas native, had resigned as supreme commander of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) less than six weeks before the convention to pursue the nomination actively.

As in 1912, when Taft's father had engaged in a bitter struggle with Theodore Roosevelt for the nomination, the outcome of the presidential race was determined in preliminary battles over convention rules and credentials.

The first confrontation came on the issue of the voting rights of challenged delegates. The Taft forces proposed adoption of the 1948 rules, which would have allowed contested delegates to vote on all credentials challenges except their own. The Eisenhower forces countered by proposing what they called a "fair play amendment," which would seat only those contested delegates who were approved by at least a two-thirds vote of the national committee. At stake were a total of sixty-eight delegates from Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas, with the large majority of the challenged delegates in favor of Taft. The Taft forces introduced a substitute to the "fair play amendment," designed to exempt seven delegates from Louisiana. On the first test of strength between the two candidates, the Eisenhower forces were victorious, as the substitute amendment was defeated, 658 to 548. The "fair play amendment" was subsequently approved by a voice vote. (Table, p. 723.)

The second confrontation developed with the report of the credentials committee. The Eisenhower forces presented a minority report concerning the contested Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas seats. After a bitter debate, a roll-call vote was taken on the Georgia challenge, with the Eisenhower forces winning again, 607 to 531.

The Louisiana and Texas challenges were settled in favor of the Eisenhower forces without a roll-call vote. The favorable settlement of the credentials challenges increased the momentum behind the Eisenhower candidacy.

Before the presidential balloting began, a nonpartisan debate was held on a proposal to add state chairmen to the national committee from states recording Republican electoral majorities and to remove the requirement that women hold one of each state's seats on the national committee. The proposal was primarily intended to decrease southern influence on the national committee. But the major opposition was raised by a number of women delegates who objected to the rule change; however, their effort to defeat it was rejected by voice vote.

Five men were nominated for the presidency, but on completion of the first roll call Eisenhower had 595 votes and was within nine votes of victory. Taft was a strong second with 500 votes. However, before a second ballot could begin, Minnesota switched 19 votes from favorite son Harold E. Stassen to Eisenhower, giving the latter the nomination. After a series of vote changes, the final tally stood: Eisenhower, 845; Taft, 280; other candidates, 81. The general's nomination was subsequently made unanimous.

Eisenhower's choice as a running mate, thirty-nine-year-old senator Richard Nixon of California, was nominated by acclamation. Eisenhower promised in his acceptance speech to lead a "crusade" against "a party too long in power."

The 6,000-word platform was adopted by a voice vote. The document included a sharp attack on the Democrats, charging the Roosevelt and Truman administrations with “violating our liberties ... by seizing powers never granted,” “shielding traitors,” and attempting to establish “national socialism.” The foreign policy section, written by John Foster Dulles, supported the concept of collective security but denounced the Truman policy of containment and blamed the administration for the communist takeover of China. The Republican platform advocated increased national preparedness.

As well as castigating the Democrats for an incompetent foreign policy, the Republicans denounced their opposition for laxness in maintaining internal security. A plank asserted: “There are no Communists in the Republican Party.”

On most domestic issues the platform advocated a reduction in federal power. The civil rights plank proposed federal action to outlaw lynching, poll taxes, and discriminatory employment practices. However, unlike the plank four years earlier, the Republican position included a paragraph that declared the individual states had primary responsibility for their domestic institutions. On a related issue of states’ rights, the Republicans, as in 1948, favored state control of tideland resources.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1952:

Democratic Failures. We charge that they have arrogantly deprived our citizens of precious liberties by seizing powers never granted.

We charge that they work unceasingly to achieve their goal of national socialism....

We charge that they have shielded traitors to the Nation in high places, and that they have created enemies abroad where we should have friends.

We charge that they have violated our liberties by turning loose upon the country a swarm of arrogant bureaucrats and their agents who meddle intolerably in the lives and occupations of our citizens.

We charge that there has been corruption in high places, and that examples of dishonesty and dishonor have shamed the moral standards of the American people.

We charge that they have plunged us into war in Korea without the consent of our citizens through their authorized representatives in the Congress, and have carried on the war without will to victory....

Tehran, Yalta and Potsdam were the scenes of those tragic blunders with others to follow. The leaders of the Administration in power acted without the knowledge or consent of Congress or of the American people. They traded our overwhelming victory for a new enemy and for new oppressions and new wars which were quick to come.

... And finally they denied the military aid that had been authorized by Congress and which was crucially needed if China were to be saved. Thus they substituted on our Pacific flank a murderous enemy for an ally and friend.

Internal Security. By the Administration’s appeasement of Communism at home and abroad it has permitted Communists and their fellow travelers to serve in many key agencies and to infiltrate our American life....

There are no Communists in the Republican Party. We have always recognized Communism to be a world conspiracy against freedom and religion. We never compromised with Communism and we have fought to expose it and to eliminate it in government and American life.

Civil Rights. We believe that it is the primary responsibility of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions, and this power, reserved to the states, is essential to the maintenance of our Federal Republic. However, we believe that the Federal Government should take supplemental action within its constitutional jurisdiction to oppose discrimination against race, religion or national origin.

We will prove our good faith by:

Appointing qualified persons, without distinction of race, religion or national origin, to responsible positions in the Government.

Federal action toward the elimination of lynching.

Federal action toward the elimination of poll taxes as a prerequisite to voting.

Appropriate action to end segregation in the District of Columbia.

Enacting Federal legislation to further just and equitable treatment in the area of discriminatory employment practices. Federal action should not duplicate state efforts to end such practices; should not set up another huge bureaucracy.

Labor. We favor the retention of the Taft-Hartley Act.

... We urge the adoption of such amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act as time and experience show to be desirable, and which further protect the rights of labor, management and the public.

Democrats

The Democrats held their 1952 convention in Chicago in late July. The convention lasted six days, the longest by either party in the post-World War II years. The proceedings were enlivened by disputes over credentials and a party loyalty pledge and a wide-open race for the presidential nomination.

The legitimately selected Texas delegation, dominated by the Dixiecrat wing of the state party, was challenged by a delegation loyal to the national party, but chosen in a rump assembly. Without a roll-call vote, the convention approved the credentials of the Dixiecrat-oriented delegates, although their seating was protested by Northern liberals.

The Dixiecrat bolt of 1948 resulted in the introduction of a party loyalty pledge at the 1952 convention. The resolution, introduced by Sen. Blair Moody of Michigan, proposed that no delegates be seated who would not assure the credentials committee that they would work to have the Democratic national ticket placed on the ballot in their state under the party’s name. This resolution was aimed at several southern states that had listed the Thurmond-Wright ticket under the Democratic Party label on their state ballots in 1948.

Sen. Spessard L. Holland of Florida introduced a substitute resolution that simply declared it would be “honorable” for each delegate to adhere to the decisions reached in the convention. Holland’s resolution, however, was defeated and Moody’s was approved, both by voice votes.

The report of the credentials committee listed three southern states—Louisiana, South Carolina, and Virginia—that declined to abide by the Moody resolution. The question of their seating rights came to a head during the roll call for presidential nominations, when Virginia questioned its own status in the convention. A motion to seat the Virginia delegation in spite of its nonobservance of the resolution was presented for a vote. Although not agreeing to the pledge, the chairman of the Virginia delegation indicated that the problem prompting the Moody resolution was covered by state law. After a long, confusing roll call, interrupted frequently by demands to poll individual delegates, the motion to seat the Virginia delegation passed, 650½ to 518. (Table, p. 724.)

After efforts to adjourn were defeated, the Louisiana and South Carolina delegations offered assurances similar to those presented by Virginia and were seated by a voice vote.

Eleven names were placed in nomination for the presidency, although the favorite of most party leaders, Illinois governor Adlai E. Stevenson, was a reluctant candidate. Stevenson expressed interest only in running for reelection as governor, but a draft-Stevenson movement developed and gained strength quickly as the convention proceeded.

Sen. Estes Kefauver of Tennessee, a powerful vote-getter in the primaries, was the leader on the first ballot, with 340 votes. He was followed by Stevenson with 273; Sen. Richard B. Russell of Georgia, the southern favorite, with 268; and W. Averell Harriman of New York with 123½.

The second ballot saw gains by the three front-runners, with Kefauver’s vote rising to 362½, Stevenson’s to 324½, and Russell’s to 294. A recess was taken during which Harriman and Massachusetts’ favorite son, Gov. Paul A. Dever, both withdrew in favor of Stevenson.

The Illinois governor won a narrow majority on the third ballot, receiving 617½ of the 1,230 convention votes. Kefauver finished with 275½ and Russell with 261. The selection of Stevenson represented the first success for a presidential draft movement of a reluctant candidate since the nomination of James A. Garfield by the Republicans in 1880. (Table, p. 724.)

For vice president, Stevenson chose Sen. John J. Sparkman of Alabama, who was nominated by acclamation.

Although a reluctant candidate, Stevenson promised the delegates a fighting campaign but warned: “Better we lose the election than mislead the people; and better we lose than misgovern the people.”

The Democratic platform was adopted without the rancor that had accompanied consideration of the party platform four years earlier. The document was approved by a voice vote, although both the Georgia and Mississippi delegations asked that they be recorded in opposition.

The platform promised extension and improvement of New Deal and Fair Deal policies that had been proposed and enacted over the previous twenty years. The party’s foremost goal was stated to be “peace with honor,” which could be achieved by support for a strengthened United Nations, coupled with the policy of collective security in the form of American assistance for allies around the world. The peaceful use of atomic energy was pledged, as were efforts to establish an international control system. However, the platform also promised the use of atomic weapons, if needed, for national defense.

The civil rights plank was nearly identical to the one that appeared in the 1948 platform. Federal legislation was called for to guarantee equal rights in voting participation, employment opportunity, and personal security.

The platform called for extending and changing the Social Security system. A plank favored elimination of the work clause so that the elderly could collect benefits and still work.

Political reform was recommended that would require the disclosure of campaign expenses in federal elections.

The Democrats and Republicans took different stands on several major domestic issues. The Democrats favored repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act; the Republicans proposed to retain the act but make modifications where necessary. The Democrats advocated closing tax loopholes and, after defense needs were met, reducing taxes. The Republicans called for tax reduction based on a cut in government spending. In education, the Democrats favored federal assistance to state and local units; the Republicans viewed education solely as the responsibility of local and state governments.

The Democrats favored continuation of federal power projects, while the Republicans opposed “all-powerful federal socialistic valley authorities.”

Both parties favored a parity price program for farmers. The Democrats advocated a mandatory price support program for basic agricultural products at not less than 90 percent of parity, and the Republicans proposing a program that would establish “full parity prices for all farm products.”

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1952:

Atomic Energy. In the field of atomic energy, we pledge ourselves:

- (1) to maintain vigorous and non-partisan civilian administrations, with adequate security safeguards;
- (2) to promote the development of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes in the interests of America and mankind;
- (3) to build all the atomic and hydrogen firepower needed to defend our country, deter aggression, and promote world peace;
- (4) to exert every effort to bring about bona fide international control and inspection of all atomic weapons.

Civil Rights. We will continue our efforts to eradicate discrimination based on race, religion or national origin....

We are proud of the progress that has been made in securing equality of treatment and opportunity in the Nation's armed forces and the civil service and all areas under Federal jurisdiction....

At the same time, we favor Federal legislation effectively to secure these rights to everyone:

- (1) the right to equal opportunity for employment;
- (2) the right to security of persons;
- (3) the right to full and equal participation in the Nation's political life, free from arbitrary restraints.

Agriculture. We will continue to protect the producers of basic agricultural commodities under the terms of a mandatory price support program at not less than ninety percent of parity. We continue to advocate practical methods for extending price supports to other storables and to the producers of perishable commodities, which account for three-fourths of all farm income.

Campaign Finance. We advocate new legislation to provide effective regulation and full disclosure of campaign expenditures in elections to Federal office, including political advertising from any source.

Labor. We strongly advocate the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Tax Reform. We believe in fair and equitable taxation. We oppose a Federal general sales tax. We adhere to the principle of ability to pay. We have enacted an emergency excess profits tax to prevent profiteering from the defense program and have vigorously attacked special tax privileges.... As rapidly as defense requirements permit, we favor reducing taxes, especially for people with lower incomes....

Justice requires the elimination of tax loopholes which favor special groups. We pledge continued efforts to the elimination of remaining loopholes.

Social Security. We favor the complete elimination of the work clause for the reason that those contributing to the Social Security program should be permitted to draw benefits, upon reaching the age of eligibility, and still continue to work.

Education. Local, State and Federal governments have shared responsibility to contribute appropriately to the pressing needs of our educational system. We urge that Federal contributions be made available to State and local units which adhere to basic minimum standards.

The Federal Government should not dictate nor control educational policy.

Democrats

Both parties held their conventions in August, the latest date ever for the Republicans and the latest for the Democrats since the wartime convention of 1864. For the first time since 1888 the date of the Democratic convention preceded that of the Republicans. The Democrats met in mid-August in Chicago with an allotment of 1,372 votes, the largest in party history. The increased allotment was the result of a new distribution formula, which for the first time rewarded states for electing Democratic governors and senators in addition to supporting the party's presidential candidate.

A provision of the convention call handled the party loyalty question, a thorny issue at the 1952 convention, by assuming that, in the absence of a challenge, any delegate would be understood to have the best interests of the party at heart. Another provision of the call threatened any national committee member who did not support the party's national ticket with removal from the Democratic National Committee.

In an unusual occurrence, nominating speeches were delivered by a past and a future president for men who would not attain the office themselves. Sen. John F. Kennedy of Massachusetts placed Adlai E. Stevenson's name in nomination, while former president Harry S. Truman seconded the nomination of New York governor W. Averell Harriman. Truman criticized Stevenson as a "defeatist" but was countered by Eleanor Roosevelt, who appeared before the convention in support of the former Illinois governor.

In spite of the oratorical byplay, Stevenson was in good position to win the nomination before the convention even began, having eliminated his principal rival, Sen. Estes Kefauver of Tennessee, in the primaries. Stevenson won a majority on the first ballot, receiving 905½ votes to easily defeat Harriman, who had 210. Sen. Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas finished third, with 80 votes. Upon completion of the roll call, a motion was approved to make Stevenson's nomination unanimous. (Table, p. 725.)

In an unusual move, Stevenson announced that he would not personally select his running mate but would leave the choice to the convention. Stevenson's desire for an open selection was designed to contrast with the expected unsurprising renominations at the upcoming Republican convention. But the unusual move caught both delegates and prospective candidates off guard.

Numerous delegations passed on the first ballot, and upon completion of the roll-call votes were scattered among thirteen different candidates. When the vote totals were announced at the end of the roll call, Kefauver led with 483½ votes, followed by Kennedy with 304, Sen. Albert A. Gore Sr. of Tennessee with 178, Mayor Robert F. Wagner of New York City with 162½, and Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota with 134½. A total of 687 votes were needed to nominate.

With a coalition that included most of the southern and eastern delegates, Kennedy drew into the lead on the second ballot. After the roll call but before the chair recognized vote changes, the totals stood: Kennedy, 618; Kefauver, 551½; Gore, 110½. Kentucky, the first state to be recognized, shifted its 30 votes to Kennedy, leaving the thirty-nine-year-old senator fewer than 40 votes short of the nomination.

But Gore was recognized next and began a bandwagon for Kefauver by withdrawing in favor of his Tennessee colleague. Other states followed Gore's lead, and at the conclusion of the vote shifts Kefauver had a clear majority. The final tally was Kefauver, 755½ and Kennedy, 589. Kennedy moved that his opponent's nomination be made unanimous.

Ironically, Kefauver won a majority of the votes in only two states in his home region, Tennessee and Florida. His strength lay in midwestern and western delegations.

As in 1948 platform debate focused on the civil rights issue. A Minnesota member of the platform committee introduced a minority report that advocated a civil rights plank stronger than that in the majority report. The plank presented by the platform committee pledged to carry out Supreme Court decisions on desegregation, but not through the use of force. The party promised to continue to work for equal rights in voting, employment, personal security, and education. The Minnesota substitute was more specific, as it favored federal legislation to achieve equal voting rights and employment opportunities and to guarantee personal safety. The minority plank also favored more rigid enforcement of civil rights legislation. Although several states clamored for a roll-call vote, the chair took a voice vote, which went against the Minnesota substitute.

The entire platform was the longest yet approved by a Democratic convention, about 12,000 words. The document was divided into eleven sections, the first dealing with defense and foreign policy and the remainder with domestic issues.

The platform described President Eisenhower as a "political amateur ... dominated ... by special privilege." It applauded the legislative accomplishments of the Democratic Congress elected in 1954 and proposed a continuation of the social and economic legislation begun during the New Deal.

The foreign policy of the Eisenhower administration was criticized in a plank that accused the Republicans of cutting funds for the military in an attempt to balance the budget. The Democrats declared that the United States must have the strongest military in the world to discourage aggression by America's enemies. The foreign policy plank also pledged to strengthen the United Nations as a peace-keeping organization and promised to work diligently for worldwide disarmament.

The platform blamed the Republicans for allowing big business to dominate the economy and promised tax relief and other government assistance to help small business. The Democrats advocated repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, as the party had done in every platform since 1948, and favored an increase in the minimum wage. Tax reductions were proposed for lower-income taxpayers, and an increase of at least $200 in the personal tax exemption was recommended.

For farmers, the Democrats proposed price supports at 90 percent of parity on basic crops, as opposed to the Republican program of flexible price supports.

For the first time since the beginning of the New Deal, the Democratic platform mentioned the importance of states' rights. The party also reiterated its position on education, which advocated federal assistance, but stated that ultimate control of the schools lay in the hands of state and local governments.

In political reform the platform proposed restrictions on government secrecy and repeated the party's call for the passage of an equal rights amendment.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1956:

Foreign Policy. The Failure at Home. Political considerations of budget balancing and tax reduction now come before the wants of our national security and the needs of our Allies. The Republicans have slashed our own armed strength, weakened our capacity to deal with military threats, stifled our air force, starved our army and weakened our capacity to deal with aggression of any sort save by retreat or by the alternatives, “massive retaliation” and global atomic war. Yet, while our troubles mount, they tell us our prestige was never higher, they tell us we were never more secure.

Disarmament. To eliminate the danger of atomic war, a universal, effective and enforced disarmament system must be the goal of responsible men and women everywhere. So long as we lack enforceable international control of weapons, we must maintain armed strength to avoid war. But technological advances in the field of nuclear weapons make disarmament an ever more urgent problem. Time and distance can never again protect any nation of the world.

Labor. We unequivocally advocate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. The Act must be repealed because State “right-to-work” laws have their genesis in its discriminatory anti-labor provisions....

The Taft-Hartley Act has been proven to be inadequate, unworkable and unfair. It interferes in an arbitrary manner with collective bargaining, causing imbalance in the relationship between management and labor.

Agriculture. Undertake immediately by appropriate action to endeavor to regain the full 100 percent of parity the farmers received under the Democratic Administrations. We will achieve this by means of supports on basic commodities at 90 percent of parity and by means of commodity loans, direct purchases, direct payments to producers, marketing agreements and orders, production adjustments, or a combination of these, including legislation, to bring order and stability into the relationship between the producer, the processor and the consumer.

Education. We are now faced with shortages of educational facilities that threaten national security, economic prosperity and human well-being. The resources of our States and localities are already strained to the limit. Federal aid and action should be provided, within the traditional framework of State and local control.

Tax Reform. We favor realistic tax adjustments, giving first consideration to small independent business and the small individual taxpayer. Lower-income families need tax relief; only a Democratic victory will assure this. We favor an increase in the present personal tax exemption of $600 to a minimum of at least $800.

Government Secrecy. Freedom of Information. During recent years there has developed a practice on the part of Federal agencies to delay and withhold information which is needed by Congress and the general public to make important decisions affecting their lives and destinies. We believe that this trend toward secrecy in Government should be reversed and that the Federal Government should return to its basic tradition of exchanging and promoting the freest flow of information possible in those unclassified areas where secrets involving weapons development and bona fide national security are not involved.

States’ Rights. While we recognize the existence of honest differences of opinion as to the true location of a Constitutional line of demarcation between the Federal Government and the States, the Democratic Party expressly recognizes the vital importance of the respective States in our Federal Union. The Party of Jefferson and Jackson pledges itself to continued support of those sound principles of local government which will best serve the welfare of our people and the safety of our democratic rights.

Civil Rights. We are proud of the record of the Democratic Party in securing equality of treatment and opportunity in the nation’s armed forces, the Civil Service, and in all areas under Federal jurisdiction. The Democratic Party pledges itself to continue its efforts to eliminate illegal discriminations of all kinds, in relation to (1) full rights to vote, (2) full rights to engage in gainful occupations, (3) full rights to enjoy security of the person, and (4) full rights to education in all publicly supported institutions.

Recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States relating to segregation in publicly supported schools and elsewhere have brought consequences of vast importance to our Nation as a whole and especially to communities directly affected. We reject all proposals for the use of force to interfere with the orderly determination of these matters by the courts.

Republicans

The Republicans opened their convention in San Francisco three days after the close of the Democratic convention in Chicago. In contrast to the turbulent convention of their adversaries, the Republicans’ renomination of Dwight D. Eisenhower and Richard Nixon was a formality. The only possible obstacle to Eisenhower’s candidacy was his health, but by August 1956 his recovery from a heart attack and an ileitis operation was complete enough to allow him to seek a second term. On the convention’s single roll call for president, Eisenhower received all 1,323 votes. (Table, p. 725.)

What drama occurred at the Republican convention surrounded the vice-presidential nomination. Several weeks before the opening of the convention, former Minnesota governor Harold Stassen, the disarmament adviser to Eisenhower, had begun a movement to replace Vice President Nixon with Massachusetts governor Christian A. Herter. However, with lack of interest from party leaders, this movement petered out. At the convention both Herter and Stassen gave nominating speeches for Nixon. During the roll call, a commotion was caused by a Nebraska delegate, who attempted to nominate “Joe Smith.” After some discussion, it was determined that “Joe Smith” was a fictitious individual, and the offending delegate was escorted from the hall. On the one ballot for vice president, a unanimous vote was recorded for Nixon.

While no opposition to the platform was expressed on the floor of the convention, several southern delegates were unhappy with the civil rights plank and withdrew from the convention. The plank in question listed advances in desegregation under the Republican administration, voiced acceptance of the Supreme Court ruling on school desegregation, and pledged to enforce existing civil rights statutes.

The platform as a whole was slightly longer than the Democratic document and was dedicated to Eisenhower and “the youth of America.” Unlike the Democratic platform, which began with a discussion of foreign policy and national defense, the first issue pursued by the Republicans was the economy.

The Eisenhower administration was praised for balancing the budget, reducing taxes, and halting inflation. The platform promised continued balanced budgets, gradual reduction of the national debt, and cuts in government spending consistent with the maintenance of a strong military. Two measures favored by the Democrats, tax relief for small businesses and tax reductions for low-income and middle-income families, were both mentioned as secondary economic goals in the Republican platform.

The labor plank advocated revision but not repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. The agricultural section favored elimination of price-depressing surpluses and continuation of the flexible price-support program. As they had for the past quarter century, the Republicans joined the Democrats in recommending passage of an equal rights amendment.

The foreign policy section of the Republican platform praised the Eisenhower administration for ending the Korean War, stemming the worldwide advance of communism and entering new collective security agreements. The plank also emphasized the necessity of a bipartisan foreign policy. The “preservation” of Israel was viewed as an “important tenet of American foreign policy,” a notable difference from the Democratic platform, which took a more even-handed approach toward both Israel and the Arab states.

The national defense section emphasized the nation’s possession of “the strongest striking force in the world,” a rebuttal to Democratic charges that the Republicans had jeopardized the efficiency of the armed forces in an effort to balance the budget.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1956:

Economy. We pledge to pursue the following objectives:

Further reductions in Government spending as recommended in the Hoover Commission Report, without weakening the support of a superior defense program or depreciating the quality of essential services of government to our people.

Continued balancing of the budget, to assure the financial strength of the country which is so vital to the struggle of the free world in its battle against Communism; and to maintain the purchasing power of a sound dollar, and the value of savings, pensions and insurance.

Gradual reduction of the national debt.

Then, insofar as consistent with a balanced budget, we pledge to work toward these additional objectives:

Further reductions in taxes with particular consideration for low and middle income families.

Initiation of a sound policy of tax reductions which will encourage small independent businesses to modernize and progress.

Labor. Revise and improve the Taft-Hartley Act so as to protect more effectively the rights of labor unions, management, the individual worker, and the public. The protection of the right of workers to organize into unions and to bargain collectively is the firm and permanent policy of the Eisenhower Administration.

Agriculture. This program must be versatile and flexible to meet effectively the impact of rapidly changing conditions. It does not envision making farmers dependent upon direct governmental payments for their incomes. Our objective is markets which return full parity to our farm and ranch people when they sell their products.

Civil Rights. The Republican Party accepts the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court that racial discrimination in publicly supported schools must be progressively eliminated. We concur in the conclusion of the Supreme Court that its decision directing school desegregation should be accomplished with “all deliberate speed” locally through Federal District Courts. The implementation order of the Supreme Court recognizes the complex and acutely emotional problems created by its decision in certain sections of our country where racial patterns have been developed in accordance with prior and long-standing decisions of the same tribunal.

We believe that true progress can be attained through intelligent study, understanding, education and good will. Use of force or violence by any group or agency will tend only to worsen the many problems inherent in the situation. This progress must be encouraged and the work of the courts supported in every legal manner by all branches of the Federal Government to the end that the constitutional ideal of equality before the law, regardless of race, creed or color, will be steadily achieved.

Foreign Policy. The advance of Communism has been checked, and, at key points, thrown back. The once-monolithic structure of International Communism, denied the stimulant of successive conquests, has shown hesitancy both internally and abroad.

National Defense. We have the strongest striking force in the world—in the air—on the sea—and a magnificent supporting land force in our Army and Marine Corps.

Israel. We regard the preservation of Israel as an important tenet of American foreign policy. We are determined that the integrity of an independent Jewish State shall be maintained. We shall support the independence of Israel against armed aggression. The best hope for peace in the Middle East lies in the United Nations. We pledge our continued efforts to eliminate the obstacles to a lasting peace in this area.

Democrats

For the first time, a national political convention was held in Los Angeles. More than 4,000 delegates and alternates converged on the California metropolis in July to select the Democratic standard-bearers for 1960. The delegate-allocation method had been changed since 1956 by the Democratic National Committee, from a formula that included Democratic voting strength to a system that emphasized population only. No states lost seats, but the new formula tended to strengthen populous northern states.

The early sessions of the convention dealt with rules and credentials. The convention rules, approved without debate, included the compromise loyalty pledge adopted by the 1956 convention. The only credentials dispute involved two contesting delegations from the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. By a voice vote, the convention agreed to seat both delegations while splitting the vote of the Commonwealth.

The front-runner for the presidential nomination was Massachusetts senator John F. Kennedy, whose success in the primaries and support from many of the party's urban leaders put him on the verge of a nominating majority. His principal rival was Senate majority leader Lyndon B. Johnson of Texas, although the favorite of the convention galleries was Adlai E. Stevenson, the party's unsuccessful standard-bearer in 1952 and 1956. Johnson challenged Kennedy to a debate, which was held before a joint gathering of the Massachusetts and Texas delegations. Coming the day before the balloting, the debate had little effect on the ultimate outcome.

Nine men were nominated, but Kennedy received a clear majority on the first ballot. At the end of the roll call, the Massachusetts senator had 806 votes, to easily outdistance

Johnson, who received 409. Sen. Stuart Symington of Missouri was a distant third with 86 votes, and Stevenson followed with 79½. A motion to make Kennedy's nomination unanimous was approved by a voice vote. Kennedy's selection marked the first time since 1920 that a senator had been nominated for the presidency by Democrats or Republicans and the first time since 1928 that a Roman Catholic had been represented on a national ticket of one of the two major parties. (Table, p. 726.)

Kennedy surprised some supporters and political observers by choosing his erstwhile adversary, Johnson, as his running mate. A motion to nominate Johnson by acclamation was approved by a voice vote.

Kennedy delivered his acceptance speech to 80,000 supporters at the Los Angeles Coliseum. He envisioned the United States as "on the edge of a new frontier—the frontier of the 1960s—a frontier of unknown opportunities and perils—a frontier of unfulfilled hopes and threats," adding that this "new frontier ... is not a set of promises—it is a set of challenges."

The Democratic platform was easily the longest yet written by the party, about 20,000 words. The platform itself was approved by a voice vote, although the civil rights and fiscal responsibility planks were debated on the convention floor, and roll-call votes had been taken in committee.

Regional hearings had been held by subcommittees of the 108-member platform committee in the spring, but votes on controversial issues were not taken by the full committee until the convention. A plank that urged elimination of the immigration quota system was approved, 66 to 28, with opposition led by Sen. James O. Eastland of Mississippi. An agricultural plank recommending price supports at 90 percent of parity was passed, 66 to 22, with opponents claiming that it was a restatement of the liberal program proposed by the National Farmers Union. A motion to reconsider the plank was defeated, 38 to 32. An Eastland motion to delete condemnation of “right-to-work” laws was defeated without a recorded vote.

The civil rights plank caused the greatest controversy. Sen. Sam J. Ervin Jr. of North Carolina introduced motions to delete portions that proposed establishing a Fair Employment Practices Commission, continuing the Civil Rights Commission as a permanent agency, granting the attorney general the power to file civil injunction suits to prevent discrimination, and setting 1963 as the deadline for the initiation of school desegregation plans. Ervin’s motions were defeated by a voice vote, and the entire plank was approved, 66 to 24.

Delegates from nine southern states signed a statement that repudiated the civil rights plank. Led by Georgia Democratic Chairman James H. Gray and Ervin, these nine states introduced a minority report on the convention floor calling for elimination of the platform’s civil rights plank. After an hour’s debate, the minority report was rejected by a voice vote.

As approved by the convention, the platform began with a discussion of foreign policy. The Democrats blamed the Republican administration for allowing the U.S. military strength to deteriorate. The national defense plank declared there was a “missile gap, space gap, and limited-war gap,” and promised to improve America’s military position so that it would be second to none. The Democrats recommended creation of “a national peace agency for disarmament planning and research.” The money saved by international disarmament, the plank stated, could be used to attack world poverty.

Foreign military aid was viewed as a short-range necessity that should be replaced by economic aid “as rapidly as security considerations permit.” At the same time, the platform proposed that development programs be placed on a “long-term basis to permit more effective planning.”

The Democrats’ economic plank called for an average national growth rate of 5 percent annually. Economic growth at this rate would create needed tax revenue, the Democrats believed, which—coupled with cuts in government waste, closing of tax loopholes, and more extensive efforts to catch tax evaders—would help balance the budget. The Democrats promised to use measures such as public works projects and temporary tax cuts to combat recessions or depressions.

The platform promised an increase in the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour and pledged to extend coverage to include more workers. There was a pledge to amend the Social Security program so the elderly could continue working without sacrificing basic benefits.

Equal rights legislation was favored, although the platform did not call for passage of a constitutional amendment of 1960.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1960:

National Defense. Our military position today is measured in terms of gaps—missile gap, space gap, limited-war gap....

This is the strength that must be erected:

1. Deterrent military power such that the Soviet and Chinese leaders will have no doubt that an attack on the United States would surely be followed by their own destruction.

2. Balanced conventional military forces which will permit a response graded to the intensity of any threats of aggressive force.

3. Continuous modernization of these forces through intensified research and development, including essential programs now slowed down, terminated, suspended or neglected for lack of budgetary support.

Disarmament. This requires a national peace agency for disarmament planning and research to muster the scientific ingenuity, coordination, continuity, and seriousness of purpose which are now lacking in our arms control efforts....

As world-wide disarmament proceeds, it will free vast resources for a new international attack on the problem of world poverty.

Immigration. The national-origins quota system of limiting immigration contradicts the founding principles of this nation. It is inconsistent with our belief in the rights of man. This system was instituted after World War I as a policy of deliberate discrimination by a Republican Administration and Congress.

Foreign Aid. Where military assistance remains essential for the common defense, we shall see that the requirements are fully met. But as rapidly as security considerations permit, we will replace tanks with tractors, bombers with bulldozers, and tacticians with technicians.

Civil Rights. We believe that every school district affected by the Supreme Court’s school desegregation decision should submit a plan providing for at least first-step compliance by 1963, the 100th anniversary of the Emancipation Proclamation.

For this and for the protection of all other Constitutional rights of Americans, the Attorney General should be empowered and directed to file civil injunction suits in Federal courts to prevent the denial of any civil right on grounds of race, creed or color.

Economy. We Democrats believe that our economy can and must grow at an average rate of 5 percent annually, almost twice as fast as our average annual rate since 1953. We pledge ourselves to policies that will achieve this goal without inflation....

The policies of a Democratic Administration to restore economic growth will reduce current unemployment to a minimum.

Tax Reform. We shall close the loopholes in the tax laws by which certain privileged groups legally escape their fair share of taxation.

Labor. We pledge to raise the minimum wage to $1.25 an hour and to extend coverage to several million workers not now protected.

Agriculture. The Democratic Administration will work to bring about full parity income for farmers in all segments of agriculture by helping them to balance farm production with the expanding needs of the nation and the world.

Measures to this end include production and marketing quotas measured in terms of barrels, bushels and bales, loans on basic commodities at not less than 90 percent of parity, production payments, commodity purchases, and marketing orders and agreements.

Government Spending. The Democratic Party believes that state and local governments are strengthened—not weakened—by financial assistance from the Federal Government. We will extend such aid without impairing local administration through unnecessary Federal interference or red tape.

Republicans

On July 25, ten days after the close of the Democratic convention, the Republican convention opened in Chicago. Although Vice President Richard Nixon had a lock on the presidential nomination, the party's two major figures four years later, Arizona senator Barry Goldwater and New York governor Nelson A. Rockefeller, both had major roles in convention activities.

Both Goldwater and Rockefeller announced that they did not want their names placed in nomination, but the Arizona delegation disregarded Goldwater's request and nominated him anyway. In a convention speech, the Arizona senator withdrew his name and went on to advise conservative Republicans to work within the party: "Let's grow up conservatives.... If we want to take this party back—and I think we can someday—let's get to work."

On the roll call that followed, Nixon was a nearly unanimous choice, receiving 1,321 votes to 10 for Goldwater (all from Louisiana). On a voice vote, Nixon's nomination was made unanimous. (Table, p. 726.)

Nixon reportedly wanted Rockefeller as his running mate but was unable to persuade the New Yorker to join the ticket. The Republican standard-bearer subsequently turned to United Nations Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge Jr., a former senator from Massachusetts who had been beaten for reelection by Kennedy in 1952. On the vice-presidential ballot, Lodge received all but one vote. The lone dissenter, a Texas delegate, initially abstained but switched his vote to Lodge at the end of the roll call.

In his acceptance speech, Nixon promised to campaign in all fifty states and rebutted a theme in Kennedy's acceptance speech. "Our primary aim must be not to help government, but to help people—to help people attain the life they deserve," said Nixon.

Much of the drama of the 1960 Republican convention surrounded the party platform. The highlight of the platform maneuvering was a late-night meeting involving Nixon and Rockefeller, held at Rockefeller's New York City apartment two days before the opening of the convention. The meeting, a secret to most of Nixon's closest aides, resulted in a fourteen-point agreement between the two Republican leaders on major issues contained in the platform. The agreement, informally dubbed the "compact of Fifth Avenue," was issued by Rockefeller, who declared that the meeting was held at Nixon's insistence.

Half of the fourteen points dealt with national security and foreign policy. The other half discussed domestic issues, including government reorganization, civil rights, agriculture, economic growth, and medical care for the elderly. Although not markedly different in wording from the draft of the platform committee, the "compact" expressed a tone of urgency that was not evident in the draft.

The Nixon-Rockefeller agreement was made with the knowledge of the platform committee chairman, Charles H. Percy of Illinois, but was greeted with hostility by many members of the committee and by party conservatives. Goldwater termed the "compact" a "surrender" and the "Munich of the Republican Party" that would ensure the party's defeat that fall.

The two issues of greatest controversy were civil rights and national defense. The original civil rights plank, drafted by the platform committee, did not express support for civil rights demonstrations or promise federal efforts to gain job equality for blacks. The Nixon-Rockefeller agreement did both. Nixon threatened to wage a floor fight if the stronger civil rights plank was not inserted in the platform. By a vote of 50 to 35, the platform committee agreed to reconsider the original civil rights plank; by a margin of 56 to 28, the stronger plank was approved.

With the approval of both Rockefeller and President Dwight D. Eisenhower, several changes were made in the national security plank that emphasized the necessity of quickly upgrading America's armed forces. The platform committee approved reconsideration of the original defense plank by a voice vote, and the whole platform was adopted unanimously.

With disagreements resolved in the committee, there were neither minority reports nor floor fights. The convention approved the platform by a voice vote.

In its final form, the Republican platform was shorter than its Democratic counterpart, although still nearly 15,000 words in length. The foreign policy section asserted that the nation's greatest task was "to nullify the Soviet conspiracy." The platform claimed that America's military strength was second to none but, in line with the Nixon-Rockefeller "compact," indicated that improvements were needed in some parts of the armed forces.

The Republicans joined their Democratic opposition in favoring a workable disarmament program but did not advocate a phaseout of foreign military aid, as did the Democrats. However, the Republicans proposed a change in the funding of foreign aid that emphasized "the increasing use of private capital and government loans, rather than outright grants."

The Republicans agreed with the Democrats that the nation should experience more rapid economic growth but did not adopt the 5 percent annual growth rate favored by the Democrats. The Republicans stressed the virtues of a balanced budget and regarded free enterprise, rather than massive government programs, as the key to economic growth.

As in 1956, the two parties differed on farm price supports. The Republicans supported a program of flexible support payments, while the Democrats recommended setting price supports at 90 percent of parity.

Both parties proposed allowing individuals to work beyond their mandatory retirement age, although the Democrats tied their proposal to amendment of the Social Security program.

The Republicans did not urge elimination of the immigration quota system, as did their opponents, but they favored overhaul of the system to allow an increase in immigration.

On the issue of equal rights, the Republicans continued to favor passage of a constitutional amendment. The Democrats had backed away from this position, which they had held in earlier platforms, instead proposing the passage of equal rights legislation in Congress.

As they had since the beginning of the New Deal, the Republican and Democratic platforms differed noticeably as to the extent and desirability of federal spending. The Democrats viewed federal assistance to state and local governments as beneficial. The Republicans believed the federal government could help meet the problems of urban growth, but that state and local governments should administer all the programs they could best handle.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1960:

National Defense. The future of freedom depends heavily upon America's military might and that of her allies. Under the Eisenhower-Nixon Administration, our military might has been forged into a power second to none....

The strategic imperatives of our national defense policy are these:

A second-strike capability, that is, a nuclear retaliatory power that can survive surprise attack, strike back, and destroy any possible enemy.

Highly mobile and versatile forces, including forces deployed, to deter or check local aggressions and "brush fire wars" which might bring on all-out nuclear war.

Disarmament. We are similarly ready to negotiate and to institute realistic methods and safeguards for disarmament, and for the suspension of nuclear tests. We advocate an early agreement by all nations to forego nuclear tests in the atmosphere, and the suspension of other tests as verification techniques permit.

Immigration. The annual number of immigrants we accept be at least doubled.

Obsolete immigration laws be amended by abandoning the outdated 1920 census data as a base and substituting the 1960 census.

The guidelines of our immigration policy be based upon judgment of the individual merit of each applicant for admission and citizenship.

Foreign Aid. Agreeable to the developing nations, we would join with them in inviting countries with advanced economies to share with us a proportionate part of the capital and technical aid required. We would emphasize the increasing use of private capital and government loans, rather than outright grants, as a means of fostering independence and mutual respect.

Civil Rights. Voting. We pledge:

Continued vigorous enforcement of the civil rights laws to guarantee the right to vote to all citizens in all areas of the country....

Public Schools. We pledge:

The Department of Justice will continue its vigorous support of court orders for school desegregation ....

We oppose the pretense of fixing a target date 3 years from now for the mere submission of plans for school desegregation. Slow-moving school districts would construe it as a three-year moratorium during which progress would cease, postponing until 1963 the legal process to enforce compliance. We believe that each of the pending court actions should proceed as the Supreme Court has directed and that in no district should there be any such delay.

Employment. We pledge:

Continued support for legislation to establish a Commission on Equal Job Opportunity to make permanent and to expand with legislative backing the excellent work being performed by the President's Committee on Government Contracts....

Housing. We pledge:

Action to prohibit discrimination in housing constructed with the aid of federal subsidies.

Economy. We reject the concept of artificial growth forced by massive new federal spending and loose money policies. The only effective way to accelerate economic growth is to increase the traditional strengths of our free economy—initiative and investment, productivity and efficiency.

Agriculture. Use of price supports at levels best fitted to specific commodities, in order to widen markets, ease production controls, and help achieve increased farm family income.

Government Reorganization. The President must continue to be able to reorganize and streamline executive operations to keep the executive branch capable of responding effectively to rapidly changing conditions in both foreign and domestic fields....

Government Spending. Vigorous state and local governments are a vital part of our federal union. The federal government should leave to state and local governments those programs and problems which they can best handle and tax sources adequate to finance them. We must continue to improve liaison between federal, state and local governments. We believe that the federal government, when appropriate, should render significant assistance in dealing with our urgent problems of urban growth and change. No vast new bureaucracy is needed to achieve this objective.

Republicans

Division between the party's conservative and moderate wings, muted during the Eisenhower administration, exploded at the Republicans' July 13–16 convention in San Francisco. Although Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona, the hero of Republican conservatives, had a commanding lead as the convention opened, he was vigorously challenged by Pennsylvania governor William W. Scranton, the belated leader of the moderate forces. Two days before the presidential balloting, a letter in Scranton's name was sent to Goldwater. It charged the Goldwater organization with regarding the delegates as "little more than a flock of chickens whose necks will be wrung at will." The message continued, describing Goldwater's political philosophy as a "crazy-quilt collection of absurd and dangerous positions." The letter concluded by challenging the Arizona senator to a debate before the convention. Although the message was written by Scranton's staff without his knowledge, the Pennsylvania governor supported the substance of the letter. Goldwater declined the invitation to debate.

Although seven names were placed in nomination for the presidency, the outcome was a foregone conclusion. Goldwater was an easy winner on the first ballot, receiving 883 of the 1,308 votes. Scranton was a distant second with 214 votes; New York governor Nelson A. Rockefeller followed with 114. Scranton moved that Goldwater's nomination be made unanimous, and his motion was approved by a voice vote. Support for the major moderate candidates, Scranton and Rockefeller, was centered in the Northeast. Goldwater had an overwhelming majority of the delegates from other regions. (Table, p. 727.)

As his running mate, Goldwater selected the Republican national chairman, Rep. William E. Miller of New York.

On disclosing his choice of Miller, Goldwater stated that "one of the reasons I chose Miller is that he drives Johnson nuts." On the vice-presidential roll call, the conservative New York representative received 1,305 votes, with three delegates from Tennessee abstaining. Miller became the first Roman Catholic to be on a Republican Party national ticket.

Goldwater's acceptance speech was uncompromising and did not attempt to dilute his conservatism in an effort to gain votes: "Anyone who joins us in all sincerity we welcome. Those who do not care for our cause, we don't expect to enter our ranks in any case. And let our Republicanism so focused and so dedicated not be made fuzzy and futile by unthinking and stupid labels. I would remind you that extremism in the defense of liberty is no vice. And let me remind you also that moderation in the pursuit of justice is no virtue."

By a voice vote, the convention adopted the party platform, but not before the moderate forces waged floor fights on three issues—extremism, civil rights, and control of nuclear weapons. Within the platform committee, 70 to 80 different amendments were presented, but when the platform reached the floor the moderates concentrated on these three specific issues.

Extremism was the first issue considered, with Sen. Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania introducing an amendment that specifically denounced efforts of the John Birch Society, the Ku Klux Klan, and the Communist Party to infiltrate the Republican Party. Rockefeller spoke on behalf of the amendment but was booed throughout his speech. Rockefeller argued that a "radical, high-financed, disciplined minority" was trying to take over the Republican Party, a minority "wholly alien to the middle course ... the mainstream." The amendment was rejected on a standing vote, by a margin estimated at two to one.

A second amendment on extremism, proposed by Michigan governor George W. Romney, condemned extremist groups but not by name. The Romney amendment was similarly rejected on a standing vote by about the same margin. Scott introduced a civil rights amendment adding additional pledges to the existing plank, including more manpower for the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division; a statement of pride in Republican support of the 1964 Civil Rights Act; requirements for first-step compliance with school desegregation by all school districts in one year; voting guarantees to state as well as federal elections, and promises to eliminate job bias. The platform's brief plank on civil rights called for "full implementation and faithful execution" of the 1964 act, but it also stated that "the elimination of any such discrimination is a matter of heart, conscience and education as well as of equal rights under law." On a roll-call vote, the Scott amendment was defeated, 897 to 409. The pattern of the vote closely followed the presidential ballot, with support for the amendment centered in the Northeast. (Table, p. 727.)

Romney offered a brief, alternative civil rights plank that pledged action at the state, local, and private levels to eliminate discrimination in all fields. It was defeated by a voice vote.

Scott proposed another amendment, declaring the president to have sole authority to control the use of nuclear weapons. This contrasted with Goldwater's position advocating that North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) commanders be given greater authority in the use of tactical nuclear weapons. The Scott amendment was rejected on a standing vote.

In its final form, the Republican platform was barely half as long as its Democratic counterpart. The Republican platform was divided into four sections, the first two enumerating Democratic failures in foreign policy and domestic affairs. The last two sections detailed Republican proposals.

The Republicans were suspicious of any détente with the communist world, instead calling for "a dynamic strategy of victory ... for freedom." The platform contended that American military strength was deteriorating and promised the establishment of a military force superior to that of the nation's enemies. The Republicans expressed distrust of the 1963 nuclear test ban treaty and vowed to "never unilaterally disarm America." The platform promised to revitalize NATO, which was viewed as a keystone of Republican foreign policy.

Coupled with the anticommunism of the foreign policy sections was the central theme of the domestic sections—the need to trim the power of the federal government and to relocate it in state and local governments. This conservative philosophy was evident in various domestic planks. The Republicans promised a reduction of at least $5 billion in federal spending and pledged to end budget deficits.

The "one person, one vote" ruling of the Supreme Court brought the recommendation by the Republicans that a constitutional amendment be passed to allow states with bicameral legislatures to use a measurement other than population.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1964:

Peace. This Administration has sought accommodations with Communism without adequate safeguards and compensating gains for freedom. It has alienated proven allies by opening a "hot line" first with a sworn enemy rather than with a proven friend, and in general pursued a risky path such as began at Munich a quarter century ago....

The supreme challenge to this policy is an atheistic imperialism—Communism....

National Defense. This Administration has adopted policies which will lead to a potentially fatal parity of power with Communism instead of continued military superiority for the United States.

It has permitted disarmament negotiations to proceed without adequate consideration of military judgment.... It has failed to take minimum safeguards against possible consequences of the limited nuclear test ban treaty, including advanced underground tests where permissible and full readiness to test elsewhere should the need arise....

We will maintain a superior, not merely equal, military capability as long as the Communist drive for world domination continues. It will be a capability of balanced force, superior in all its arms, maintaining flexibility for effective performance in the rapidly changing science of war.

Republicans will never unilaterally disarm America.

Berlin. We will demand that the Berlin Wall be taken down prior to the resumption of any negotiations with the Soviet Union on the status of forces in, or treaties affecting, Germany.

Cuba. We Republicans will recognize a Cuban government in exile; we will support its efforts to regain the independence of its homeland; we will assist Cuban freedom fighters in carrying on guerrilla warfare against the Communist regime; we will work for an economic boycott by all nations of the free world in trade with Cuba....

Vietnam. We will move decisively to assure victory in South Vietnam. While confining the conflict as closely as possible, America must move to end the fighting in a reasonable time and provide guarantees against further aggression. We must make it clear to the Communist world that, when conflict is forced with America, it will end only in victory for freedom.

Federal Power. Humanity is tormented once again by an age-old issue—is man to live in dignity and freedom under God or to be enslaved—are men in government to serve, or are they to master, their fellow men? ....

1. Every person has the right to govern himself, to fix his own goals, and to make his own way with a minimum of governmental interference.

2. It is for government to foster and maintain an environment of freedom encouraging every individual to develop to the fullest his God-given powers of mind, heart and body; and, beyond this, government should undertake only needful things, rightly of public concern, which the citizen cannot himself accomplish.

We Republicans hold that these two principles must regain their primacy in our government's relations, not only with the American people, but also with nations and peoples everywhere in the world.

Economy. In furtherance of our faith in the individual, we also pledge prudent, responsible management of the government's fiscal affairs to protect the individual against the evils of spendthrift government—protecting most of all the needy and fixed-income families against the cruelest tax, inflation—and protecting every citizen against the high taxes forced by excessive spending, in order that each individual may keep more of his earning for his own and his family's use.

Tax Reform. In furtherance of our faith in limited, frugal and efficient government we also pledge: credit against Federal taxes for specified State and local taxes paid, and a transfer to the States of excise and other Federal tax sources....

Civil Rights. Full implementation and faithful execution of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and all other civil rights statutes, to assure equal rights and opportunities guaranteed by the Constitution to every citizen; ... continued opposition to discrimination based on race, creed, national origin or sex. We recognize that the elimination of any such discrimination is a matter of heart, conscience, and education, as well as of equal rights under law.

Education. To continue the advancement of education on all levels, through such programs as selective aid to higher education, strengthened State and local tax resources, including tax credits for college education, while resisting the Democratic efforts which endanger local control of schools....

School Prayer. Support of a Constitutional amendment permitting those individuals and groups who choose to do so to exercise their religion freely in public places, provided religious exercises are not prepared or prescribed by the state or political subdivision thereof and no person's participation therein is coerced, thus preserving the traditional separation of church and state....

Obscenity. Enactment of legislation, despite Democratic opposition, to curb the flow through the mails of obscene materials which has flourished into a multimillion dollar obscenity racket....

Medical Care for Elderly. Full coverage of all medical and hospital costs for the needy elderly people, financed by general revenues through broader implementation of Federal-State plans....

Reapportionment. Support of a Constitutional amendment, as well as legislation, enabling States having bicameral legislatures to apportion one House on bases of their choosing, including factors other than population....

Democrats

In late August in Atlantic City, N.J., the Democratic convention nominated President Lyndon B. Johnson for a full term in the White House. The proceedings were stage-managed by the president and were met with little visible dissent on the convention floor. The four-day event August 24–27 was a political triumph for the veteran politician from Texas, who less than a year earlier had been the vice president under John F. Kennedy before he was assassinated.

The Democratic convention was larger than any previous convention of an American political party, with 5,260 delegates and alternates. A new vote-allocation formula was in effect that combined consideration of a state's electoral vote with its support for the Kennedy-Johnson ticket in 1960. While no states lost votes from four years earlier, many of the larger states gained significantly. As a result, there were 2,316 votes at the 1964 convention, compared with 1,521 in 1960.

With no controversy surrounding either the party nominee or platform, attention focused on the credentials challenge brought by the integrated Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party against the all-white delegation sent by the regular state party. By a voice vote, the convention approved a compromise negotiated by Minnesota senator Hubert H. Humphrey. The settlement called for seating of the Mississippi regulars, provided they signed a written pledge to back the national ticket and urged the state's presidential electors to do likewise. It also proposed the seating of Democrats as delegates at large, and the remainder of the delegation as honored guests; and it stipulated that at future conventions delegations would be barred from states that allowed racial discrimination in voting. Although the convention approved this solution, the Freedom Democrats rejected the compromise, and all but four members of the regular Mississippi delegation refused to sign the pledge and left the convention.

The convention also approved a recommendation requiring the Alabama delegation to sign a personal loyalty oath, the result of the state party's placing "unpledged" (anti-Johnson) electors on the Alabama ballot. Eleven Alabama members signed the loyalty oath; the remaining forty-two delegates and alternates withdrew from the convention.

The roll-call vote for president was dispensed with, and Johnson was nominated by acclamation. Immediately after his selection, Johnson made the unprecedented move of appearing before the delegates to announce his choice for vice president, Humphrey. Johnson had tried to make his selection as suspenseful and dramatic as possible. Although most observers felt Humphrey would be the choice, earlier that day Johnson had called both the Minnesota senator and Connecticut senator Thomas J. Dodd to the White House. However, at this meeting Johnson invited Humphrey to be on the ticket, and later that night the delegates nominated Humphrey by acclamation. (The 1964 Democratic convention was only the second in party history in which there were no roll-call votes—the other time was 1936.)

On the final day of the convention, the two nominees delivered their acceptance speeches. Humphrey frequently referred to the Republican candidate, Senator Goldwater, as

“the temporary Republican spokesman,” and listed major legislation supported by a majority of both parties in the Senate, “but not Senator Goldwater.”

The emotional highlight of the convention was the appearance of Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, who introduced a film about the presidency of his late brother.

By a voice vote, the convention approved the party platform. Following the trend toward longer and longer documents, the platform was 22,000 words in length. Although the document was adopted without debate on the convention floor, several roll-call votes were taken in the platform committee. By a vote of 53 to 16, the committee rejected a proposal by Senator Joseph S. Clark of Pennsylvania to strengthen the disarmament plank. Clark’s proposal called for further disarmament “under world law,” wording that the committee majority did not want to include.

By a margin of 39 to 38, the platform committee pledged to support a constitutional amendment giving the District of Columbia representation in Congress. On another roll-call vote (52 to 19), the committee promised to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act provision permitting state right-to-work laws.

Without a recorded vote, the committee adopted another provision by Senator Clark proposing revision of congressional rules and procedures to “assure majority rule after reasonable debate and to guarantee that major legislative proposals of the President can be brought to a vote after reasonable consideration in committee.” The proposal was a reference to the Senate cloture rule, requiring a two-thirds vote to cut off debate, and to the power of the House Rules Committee to keep legislation from the floor.

The entire platform was a wide-ranging document designed to appeal to as many segments of the electorate as possible. Self-described as a “covenant of unity,” the platform was written in a moderate tone to contrast with the unqualified conservatism expressed in the Republican platform.

The latter three-quarters of the Democratic platform was a section entitled “An Accounting of Stewardship, 1961–1964,” which described the accomplishments of the Kennedy-Johnson administration in thirty-eight areas of public policy. The first quarter of the platform discussed the party’s position on major issues of the day, from peace and national defense to civil rights, the economy, agriculture, natural resources, urban affairs, federal power and government reform, and extremism.

In view of the militant anticommunism of Senator Goldwater and the Republican platform, the Democrats viewed peace and national defense as winning issues with a majority of the electorate. The Democrats claimed that the world was closer to peace than in 1960, due in part to the overwhelming U.S. nuclear superiority and internal splits in the communist world, as well as the success of international negotiations such as those resulting in the nuclear test ban treaty. But, in an allusion to Goldwater’s stance, the platform warned that recklessness by a president in foreign policy could result in nuclear disaster. The Democratic platform included a provision rejected by the Republicans, insisting that control of nuclear weapons must be kept in the hands of the president.

While peace and national defense were stressed by the Democrats, the Republican platform concentrated on the need to limit the power of the federal government. On this issue, the Democratic platform contained a recommendation to help state and local governments develop new revenue sources. But the Democratic plank also included an assertion that contradicted the Republicans’ criticism of expanding federal power: “No government at any level can properly complain of violation of its power, if it fails to meet its responsibilities.”

Neither party had a civil rights plank containing specifics. The difference was wording, with the Democrats promising “fair, effective enforcement” of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, but precluding the use of quotas in combating racial discrimination. The Republicans pledged “full implementation and faithful execution” of civil rights laws.

Without dissent, the Democratic platform included a provision that condemned extremism of the right and left, especially the Communist Party, the Ku Klux Klan, and the John Birch Society.

The two parties differed in their opinion of the health of the economy. The Republicans blamed their opposition for inflation and continuing unemployment and promised a reduction of at least $5 billion in federal spending. The Democrats countered by claiming the Kennedy-Johnson administration had engineered “the longest and strongest peacetime prosperity in modern history.”

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1964:

Peace. At the start of the third decade of the nuclear age, the preservation of peace requires the strength to wage war and the wisdom to avoid it. The search for peace requires the utmost intelligence, the clearest vision, and a strong sense of reality.... Battered by economic failures, challenged by recent American achievements in space, torn by the Chinese-Russian rift, and faced with American strength and courage—international Communism has lost its unity and momentum.

National Defense. Specifically, we must and we will:

—Continue the overwhelming supremacy of our Strategic Nuclear Forces.

—Strengthen further our forces for discouraging limited wars and fighting subversion.

—Maintain the world’s largest research and development effort, which has initiated more than 200 new programs since 1961, to ensure continued American leadership in weapons systems and equipment....

Control of the use of nuclear weapons must remain solely with the highest elected official in the country—the President of the United States....

The complications and dangers in our restless, constantly changing world require of us consummate understanding and experience. One rash act, one thoughtless decision, one unchecked reaction—and cities could become smoldering ruins and farms parched wasteland.

Civil Rights. The Civil Rights Act of 1964 deserves and requires full observance by every American and fair, effective enforcement if there is any default....

Extremism. We condemn extremism, whether from the Right or Left, including the extreme tactics of such organizations as the Communist Party, the Ku Klux Klan and the John Birch Society.

Federal Power. The Democratic Party holds to the belief that government in the United States—local, state and federal—was created in order to serve the people. Each level of government has appropriate powers and each has specific responsibilities. The first responsibility of government at every level is to protect the basic freedoms of the people. No government at any level can properly complain of violation of its power, if it fails to meet its responsibilities.

The federal government exists not to grow larger, but to enlarge the individual potential and achievement of the people.

The federal government exists not to subordinate the states, but to support them.

Economy. In 42 months of uninterrupted expansion under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, we have achieved the longest and strongest peacetime prosperity in modern history....

It is the national purpose, and our commitment, that every man or woman who is willing and able to work is entitled to a job and to a fair wage for doing it.

Republicans

The Republican convention, held August 5–8 in Miami Beach, Fla., had a surface tranquility that the later Democratic convention lacked. Only two roll-call votes were taken to nominate presidential and vice-presidential candidates.

The credentials committee considered only one serious challenge, and that involved a single delegate. By a 32–32 vote, the committee defeated an unexpectedly strong attempt to overturn the preconvention decision to seat Rep. H.R. Gross of Iowa rather than a Des Moines housewife. The full convention approved the credentials committee report without a roll-call vote.

Delegates approved the rules committee report without comment. It contained recommendations to prohibit discrimination in the selection of future convention delegates and to add the Republican state chairmen as members of the Republican National Committee.

Twelve names were placed in nomination for the presidency, although the contest was clearly among three candidates: the front-runner, former vice president Richard Nixon, and two governors, Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York and Ronald Reagan of California. The ideological gulf between the more liberal Rockefeller and the more conservative Reagan made it difficult for them to agree on a common strategy to stop Nixon, even when Reagan abandoned his favorite-son status for active candidacy two days before the balloting.

To head off the defection to Reagan of his more conservative supporters, Nixon seemed to take a sharp tack to the right the day before the balloting. He told southern delegations he would not run an administration that would “ram anything down your throats,” that he opposed school busing, that he would appoint “strict constitutionalists” to the Supreme Court, and that he was critical of federal intervention in local school board affairs.

Nixon won the nomination on the first ballot, receiving 692 votes (25 more than necessary) to easily outdistance Rockefeller, who had 277, and Reagan, who had 182. After vote switches, the final totals were Nixon, 1,238, Rockefeller, 93, and Reagan, 2. In a brief speech, Reagan moved that Nixon’s nomination be made unanimous, but his motion was never put to a vote. (Table, p. 728.)

In his selection of a running mate, Nixon surprised many observers by tapping Gov. Spiro T. Agnew of Maryland. Agnew, who had delivered the major nominating speech for Nixon, had, ironically, been one of Rockefeller’s earliest and strongest supporters. But Agnew ceased his active support of Rockefeller in March, irked by the New York governor’s indecision about entering the race, and, at the beginning of convention week, announced his support for Nixon.

The name of Michigan governor George Romney also was placed in nomination for vice president. Agnew was an easy winner, receiving 1,119 votes to 186 for Romney, who made no effort to withdraw his name. After completion of the roll call, a Romney motion to make Agnew’s nomination unanimous was approved.

The delegates approved without debate the 1968 Republican platform, which steered a careful middle course between conservatives and liberals on domestic policy and between “doves” and “hawks” on the touchy Vietnam issue. The 11,500-word document was somewhat more liberal in tone than that of 1960 and was far removed from the militantly conservative tone of the 1964 document.

A major floor fight on the platform was averted when platform committee members, led by Senate minority leader Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, substituted for the original hard-line war plank new language stressing the need for de-Americanization of both the military and civilian efforts in Vietnam. “Doves” and “hawks” alike went along with the revised version.

As originally written, the plank criticized the Johnson administration for not leaving key Vietnam decisions to the military and for the administration’s policy of military gradualism. Both Nixon and Rockefeller backers opposed the strong language, and a compromise Vietnam plank was accepted. As well as advocating the de-Americanization of the war, it proposed concentrating on protection of the South Vietnamese population rather than on capturing territory, and on efforts to strengthen local forces and responsibility. Although the adopted platform endorsed continued negotiations with Hanoi, it remained silent on the important issues of a bombing pause and of a possible Saigon coalition that would include the communists.

In its discussion of national defense, the platform criticized the administration for failure to develop superior new weaponry. The document indicated that, when the Vietnam War was over, a reduced defense budget might make possible increased federal spending on social welfare programs. But it neither suggested how much more spending nor recommended any substantial increases in the near future.

The platform treated rioting and crime in militant fashion: “We will not tolerate violence!” The crime plank criticized the Johnson administration for not taking effective action against crime and pledged “an all-out federal-state-local crusade.”

In its youth plank, the Republicans urged the states to lower the voting age to eighteen but did not endorse proposals for a constitutional amendment to lower the federal voting age. The plank also advocated action to shorten the period in which young men were eligible for the draft and proposed to develop eventually a voluntary force.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1968:

Vietnam. The Administration’s Vietnam policy has failed—militarily, politically, diplomatically, and with relation to our own people.

We condemn the Administration’s breach of faith with the American people respecting our heavy involvement in Vietnam. Every citizen bitterly recalls the Democrat campaign oratory of 1964: “We are not about to send American boys 9–10,000 miles away from home to do what Asian boys ought to be doing for themselves.”

The entire nation has been profoundly concerned by hastily-extemporized, undeclared land wars which embroil massive U.S. Army forces thousands of miles from our shores. It is time to realize that not every international conflict is susceptible of solution by American ground forces...

We pledge to adopt a strategy relevant to the real problems of the war, concentrating on the security of the population, on developing a greater sense of nationhood, and on strengthening the local forces. It will be a strategy permitting a progressive de-Americanization of the war, both military and civilian...

National Defense. Grave errors, many now irretrievable, have characterized the direction of our nation’s defense.

A singular notion—that salvation for America lies in standing still—has pervaded the entire effort. Not retention of American superiority but parity with the Soviet Union has been made the controlling doctrine in many critical areas. We have frittered away superior military capabilities, enabling the Soviets to narrow their defense gap, in some areas to outstrip us, and to move to cancel our lead entirely by the early Seventies.

China. Improved relations with Communist nations can come only when they cease to endanger other states by force or threat. Under existing conditions, we cannot favor recognition of Communist China or its admission to the United Nations.

Crime. Fire and looting, causing millions of dollars of property damage, have brought great suffering to home owners and small businessmen, particularly in black communities least able to absorb catastrophic losses. The Republican Party strongly advocates measures to alleviate and remove the frustrations that contribute to riots. We simultaneously support decisive action to quell civil disorder, relying primarily on state and local governments to deal with these conditions.

America has adequate peaceful and lawful means for achieving even fundamental social change if the people wish it. We will not tolerate violence!

For the future, we pledge an all-out, federal-state-local crusade against crime, including:

—Leadership by an Attorney General who will restore stature and respect to that office....

—Enactment of legislation to control indiscriminate availability of firearms, safeguarding the right of responsible citizens to collect, own and use firearms for legitimate purposes, retaining primary responsibility at the state level, with such federal laws as necessary to better enable the states to meet their responsibilities.

Democrats

While violence flared in the streets and thousands of police and guards imposed security precautions unprecedented at presidential nominating conventions, the 1968 Democratic convention met August 26–29 in Chicago to nominate Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota for the presidency and to endorse the controversial Vietnam policies of the Johnson-Humphrey administration.

Twin themes—physical force to keep order and political force to overrule minority sentiment in the Democratic Party—were apparent throughout the convention.

The physical force, supplied by 11,900 Chicago police, 7,500 army regulars, 7,500 Illinois National Guardsmen, and 1,000 FBI and Secret Service agents, was exerted to keep vociferous Vietnam War critics away from the convention headquarters hotels and the International Amphitheatre where official sessions were held. A security ring several blocks wide guarded the Amphitheatre, itself surrounded by a barbed wire fence and multiple security checkpoints for entering delegates, reporters, and guests. No violence erupted in the Amphitheatre area, but near the downtown hotels there were days of bitter demonstrations that ended with repeated police use of tear gas. At the end of convention week, the Chicago police announced that 589 persons had been arrested, with more than 119 police and 100 demonstrators injured.

The political force was exerted by the Johnson administration organization backing Vice President Humphrey, whose supporters enjoyed clear control of convention proceedings from start to end. In a distinct minority were the antiwar factions that rallied around the candidacies of Sens. Eugene J. McCarthy of Minnesota and George McGovern of South Dakota. Delegates won in the primaries by the late Robert F. Kennedy, who was assassinated in June, remained uncommitted but were too few to swing the convention away from Humphrey. The McCarthy forces mounted a series of challenges to the Humphrey faction—on credentials, rules, the platform, and finally the nomination itself.

In the first business of the convention, the Humphrey and McCarthy forces joined to ban the 136-year-old unit rule, which enabled the majority of a split delegation to cast the delegation's entire vote for the candidate favored by the majority. Delegates rejected by voice vote a motion by the Texas delegation to retain the rule through the 1968 convention. However, as expected, the brief moments of unity ended when the convention moved on to consider credentials challenges.

The credentials committee had considered an unprecedented number of challenges, involving delegates from fifteen states. Although McCarthy supported almost all the challenges, his candidacy was not always the paramount issue. In the case of the disputed southern delegations, racial imbalance, the party loyalty issue, or a combination of both, were more important. Of the seventeen different challenges, McCarthy supported all but one (in Wisconsin); McGovern backed all the southern challenges; Humphrey supported only the Mississippi challenge publicly.

In a historic move, the convention by a voice vote seated a new loyalist Democratic faction from Mississippi and unseated the delegation of the traditionally segregationist, conservative regular party. The credentials committee decided all other challenges in favor of the regular delegations, but minority reports were filed for the Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, and Texas challengers. The North Carolina case was decided by a voice vote supporting the regular delegation, but the other three cases were settled by roll-call votes.

The first state to be considered was Texas, and, by a vote of 1,368 <sup>1</sup>/<sub>4</sub> to 956 <sup>3</sup>/<sub>4</sub>, the convention approved the seating of the regular delegation led by Gov. John B. Connally. The rival McCarthy-supported Texas faction was led by Sen. Ralph Yarborough. (Table, p. 729.)

The Georgia case was considered next, with the credentials committee recommending that both rival delegations be seated and the Georgia vote split evenly between them. However, both delegations found this to be an unsatisfactory solution and presented reports to have their entire delegation seated alone. A minority report to seat the challenging Loyal National Democrats, led by African American state representative Julian Bond, was defeated 1,415.45 to 1,043.55. A minority report to seat the regular delegation, handpicked by Gov. Lester G. Maddox and Democratic state chairman James H. Gray, was rejected by a voice vote. The solution recommended by the credentials committee was subsequently approved by a voice vote.

The Alabama case involved three competing factions: the regulars, the largely African American National Democratic Party of Alabama (NDPA), and the integrated Alabama Independent Democratic Party (AIDP), created solely to run a slate of presidential electors loyal to the national party against the third-party candidacy of the state's former governor, George C. Wallace. The credentials committee proposed seating all members of the regular delegation who would sign a loyalty pledge and replacing those who would not sign with loyal members of the AIDP delegation. However, the McCarthy-backed NDPA introduced a minority report to seat its entire delegation. By a vote of 1,607 to 880  $\frac{3}{4}$ , the convention rejected this minority report and by a voice vote approved the recommendation of the credentials committee.

The remainder of the credentials committee report was approved, including a resolution instructing the Democratic National Committee to include, in the call for the 1972 convention, encouragement to state parties to ensure that all Democrats in each state have a “meaningful and timely” opportunity to participate in delegate selection.

McCarthy, McGovern, and other liberal factions won their greatest breakthrough on convention rules, obtaining by a vote of 1,351  $\frac{1}{4}$  to 1,209 elimination of the unit rule at every level of party activity leading up to and including the 1972 convention. Many Humphrey-pledged delegates also backed the unit rule change. Also a part of this successful minority report was the requirement that the delegate-selection process in 1972 be public and held within the calendar year of the convention.

On Wednesday night, on the third day of the convention, while nominations and balloting for president took place at the Amphitheatre, the worst violence of the convention broke out downtown, and television screens carried pictures of phalanxes of Chicago police advancing on demonstrators. At the same time, hundreds of Chicago mayor Richard J. Daley’s workers were brought into the galleries with apparent improper credentials. Some delegates, apparently refusing to show their credentials to the omnipresent security guards, were physically ejected from the convention floor. The McCarthy and McGovern forces charged “atrocities” and tried to adjourn the convention for two weeks. House majority leader Carl Albert of Oklahoma, the convention chairman, refused to accept their motions.

In addition to Humphrey, McCarthy, and McGovern, only two other candidates were placed in nomination—the Rev. Channing E. Phillips of the District of Columbia, who became the first African American ever nominated for the presidency at a national convention, and North Carolina governor Dan K. Moore.

The emotional highlight of the session was provided by McGovern’s nominator, Connecticut senator Abraham A. Ribicoff, who charged that “with George McGovern as president of the United States we wouldn’t have to have Gestapo tactics in the streets of Chicago.”

Humphrey was an easy winner on the first ballot, receiving 1,759  $\frac{1}{4}$  votes to 601 for McCarthy, 146 $\frac{1}{2}$  for McGovern, and 67 $\frac{1}{2}$  for Phillips. Humphrey’s winning majority included the bulk of party moderates, big-city organizations of the North (including Daley’s), and southern conservatives. In a tumultuous ending to one of the wildest nights in American politics, Chairman Albert gavelled through a motion to make the nomination unanimous (despite major opposition on the floor) and adjourned the session. (Table, p. 729.)

As his running mate, Humphrey chose Maine senator Edmund S. Muskie. Julian Bond’s name also was placed in nomination, but Bond, then twenty-eight, withdrew, explaining that he was under the “legal age” to be president (the constitutional minimum is thirty-five). Before the end of the first ballot, Albert recognized Mayor Daley, who moved that Muskie be declared the vice-presidential nominee by acclamation. With the convention in a particularly unruly state, the Daley motion was quickly adopted. At the time the roll call was suspended, Muskie already had received 1,942 $\frac{1}{2}$  votes, a majority. Bond was a distant second with 48 $\frac{1}{2}$ .

The 18,000-word platform, adopted by a voice vote, was a document that met the demands of the Democratic Party’s liberals word for word in almost every section except that which dealt with U.S. policy in Vietnam. At one point during the platform-writing sessions, it appeared that Humphrey might assent to a plank calling for a halt in U.S. bombing of North Vietnam. But President Johnson reportedly sent personal instructions that the plank should support administration policy.

The administration plank, approved 62–35 in the platform committee, supported a bombing halt only when it “would not endanger the lives of our troops in the field,” did not call for a reduction in search-and-destroy missions or a withdrawal of troops until the end of the war, and advocated a new government in Saigon only after the war had ended. The minority plank, drafted by McCarthy and McGovern, called for an immediate halt to the bombing, reduction of offensive operations in the South Vietnamese countryside, a negotiated troop withdrawal, and encouragement of the South Vietnamese government to negotiate with communist insurgents.

Following nearly three hours of debate the minority plank was defeated, 1,567  $\frac{3}{4}$  to 1,041  $\frac{1}{4}$ . After the result was announced, members of the New York delegation and others slipped on black armbands and sang “We Shall Overcome.” (Table, p. 729.)

Unlike the Republican platform, which called for decreased United States involvement in Vietnam, Democrats adopted a plan that called for a continued strong American war effort. Although the Democrats agreed with Republicans that the South Vietnamese eventually should take over their nation’s defense, they gave no indication that an expanded Vietnamese role could lead to U.S. troop reductions in the near future.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1968:

Vietnam. Recognizing that events in Vietnam and the negotiations in Paris may affect the timing and the actions we recommend we would support our Government in the following steps:

Bombing—Stop all bombing of North Vietnam when this action would not endanger the lives of our troops in the field; this action should take into account the response from Hanoi.

Troop Withdrawal—Negotiate with Hanoi an immediate end or limitation of hostilities and the withdrawal from South Vietnam of all foreign forces—both United States and allied forces, and forces infiltrated from North Vietnam....

National Defense. We must and will maintain a strong and balanced defense establishment adequate to the task of security and peace. There must be no doubt about our strategic nuclear capacity, our capacity to meet limited challenges, and our willingness to act when our vital interests are threatened....

We face difficult and trying times in Asia and in Europe. We have responsibilities and commitments we cannot escape with honor.

China. The immediate prospects that China will emerge from its self-imposed isolation are dim. But both Asians and Americans will have to coexist with the 750 million Chinese on the mainland. We shall continue to make it clear that we are prepared to cooperate with China whenever it is ready to become a responsible member of the international community. We would actively encourage economic, social and cultural exchange with mainland China as a means of freeing that nation and her people from their narrow isolation.

Crime. In fighting crime we must not foster injustice. Lawlessness cannot be ended by curtailing the hard-won liberties of all Americans. The right of privacy must be safeguarded. Court procedures must be expedited. Justice delayed is justice denied.

A respect for civil peace requires also a proper respect for the legitimate means of expressing dissent. A democratic society welcomes criticism within the limits of the law. Freedom of speech, press, assembly and association, together with free exercise of the franchise, are among the legitimate means to achieve change in a democratic society. But when the dissenter resorts to violence, he erodes the institutions and values which are the underpinnings of our democratic society. We must not and will not tolerate violence.

Electoral Reform. We fully recognize the principle of one man, one vote in all elections. We urge that due consideration be given to the question of Presidential primaries throughout the nation. We urge reform of the electoral college and election procedures to assure that the votes of the people are fully reflected.

American Independent Party

Former Alabama governor George C. Wallace declared his third-party presidential candidacy on February 8, 1968. The vehicle for his candidacy was his personally created American Independent Party. No convention was held by the party to ratify his selection. (A descendant of the 1968 Wallace campaign, the American Party ran a national ticket in 1972 but received less than 2 percent of the vote.)

On February 14 Wallace announced the choice of former Georgia governor Marvin Griffin as his "interim" vice-presidential running mate, but Wallace made clear that an official candidate would be chosen later in the campaign. Griffin's tentative candidacy was necessary to allow the American Independent Party to get on the ballot in several states. On October 3 Wallace announced his choice of retired air force general Curtis E. LeMay, an Ohio native, as his official running mate.

Ten days later, Wallace released the text of his party's platform. The document generally took a harder line toward domestic and international problems than did the Democratic and Republican platforms. Wallace favored termination of the Vietnam War through negotiations but added that, if negotiations failed, the United States should seek a military solution.

As expected, the emphasis of the platform on domestic issues centered on returning control of local affairs to the states and communities, with the federal government serving in an assisting role rather than an authoritarian manner.

Following are excerpts from the American Independent Party platform of 1968:

Vietnam. We earnestly desire that the conflict be terminated through peaceful negotiations and we will lend all aid, support, effort, sincerity and prayer to the efforts of our negotiators.... If it becomes evident that the enemy does not desire to negotiate in good faith, that our hopes of termination of hostilities are not being realized and that the lives and safety of our committed troops are being further endangered, we must seek a military conclusion.

Crime. Lawlessness has become commonplace in our present society. The permissive attitude of the executive and judiciary at the national level sets the tone for this moral decay.... We will appoint as Attorney General a person interested in the enforcement rather than the disruption of legal processes and restore that office to the dignity and stature it deserves and requires.

Federal Power. The Federal Government, in derogation and flagrant violation of this Article [X] of the Bill of Rights, has in the past three decades seized and usurped many powers not delegated to it, such as, among others: the operation and control of the public school system of the several states; the power to prescribe the eligibility and qualifications of those who would vote in our state and local elections; the power to intrude upon and control the farmer in the operation of his farm; the power to tell the property owner to whom he can and cannot sell or rent his property; and, many other rights and privileges of the individual citizen, which are properly subject to state or local control, as distinguished from federal control. The Federal Government has forced the states to reapportion their legislatures, a prerogative of the states alone. The Federal Government has attempted to take over and control the seniority and apprenticeship lists of the labor unions; the Federal Government has adopted so-called "Civil Rights Acts," particularly the one adopted in 1964, which have set race against race and class against class, all of which we condemn.

The Judiciary. In the period of the past three decades, we have seen the Federal judiciary, primarily the Supreme Court, transgress repeatedly upon the prerogatives of the Congress and exceed its authority by enacting judicial legislation, in the form of decisions based upon political and sociological considerations, which would never have been enacted by the Congress. We have seen them, in their solicitude for the criminal and lawless element of our society, shackle the police and other law enforcement agencies; and, as a result, they have made it increasingly difficult to protect the law-abiding citizen from crime and criminals.... The Federal judiciary, feeling secure in their knowledge that their appointment is for life, have far exceeded their constitutional authority, which is limited to interpreting or construing the law.

It shall be our policy and our purpose, at the earliest possible time, to propose and advocate and urge the adoption of an amendment to the United States Constitution whereby members of the Federal judiciary at District level be required to face the electorate on his record at periodical intervals....

With respect to the Supreme Court and the Courts of Appeals I [George Wallace] would propose that this amendment require reconfirmation of the office holder by the United States Senate at reasonable intervals.

Democrats

Massive reforms in convention rules and delegate-selection procedures made the 1972 Democratic convention, held in Miami Beach, Florida, July 10–13, significantly different from the violence-plagued assembly in Chicago four years earlier.

Two special commissions created by the 1968 convention drafted the reforms. The Commission on Rules, chaired by Rep. James G. O'Hara of Michigan, composed the first set of rules ever written on Democratic convention procedure. Among the reforms that the Democratic National Committee adopted were:

- A new vote-allocation formula based nearly equally on electoral college strength and the Democratic vote in recent presidential elections.
- An expansion of the convention rules, platform, and credentials committees so that their make-up would reflect state population differences rather than the previous method of allocating two seats to each state.
- The assurance that women and men be equally represented on committees and among convention officers.
- The requirement that the meetings and votes of all convention committees be open to the public.
- The requirement that the reports and minority views of all the committees be released at specified dates before the opening of the convention.

- The banning of floor demonstrations for candidates.
- The arrangement of the states and territories for roll calls in random sequence determined by lot rather than in the traditional alphabetical order.

The Commission on Party Structure and Delegate Selection, first chaired by Sen. George McGovern of South Dakota and later by Rep. Donald M. Fraser of Minnesota, formulated eighteen guidelines to be met by the states in the delegate-selection process. With the approval of these guidelines by the Democratic National Committee, they became part of the 1972 convention call, thus requiring the states to be in full compliance with the guidelines before they would be seated.

Among the important features of the eighteen guidelines were the elimination of the unit rule; the restriction that no more than 10 percent of a state's delegation be named by its state committee; the requirement that all steps in the delegate-selection process be publicly advertised and held in easily accessible public places within the calendar year of the convention; the requirement that women, youth, and minority groups be included in delegations "in reasonable relationship" to their presence in the state's population; and the establishment of a detailed, public method of hearing delegate challenges.

The reforms encouraged an unprecedented number of challenges. The credentials committee opened hearings in Washington, D.C., two weeks before the start of the convention, faced with eighty-two challenges from thirty states and one territory. A total of 1,289 delegates were challenged, representing more than 40 percent of the convention delegates. More than four-fifths of the challenges were filed on grounds of noncompliance with reform commission guidelines regarding adequate representation of women, youth, and minorities.

The most controversial challenges involved the California delegation and the part of the Illinois delegation controlled by Mayor Richard J. Daley of Chicago. The credentials committee, in a move that surprised supporters of McGovern, a candidate for the presidential nomination, upheld a challenge of California's winner-take-all primary law, stripping McGovern of 151 of the 271 delegate votes he had won in the primary.

The committee voted 72 to 66 to award the 151 convention seats to Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey of Minnesota and seven other candidates in proportion to their share of the popular ballots cast in the state's June primary. Although McGovern was clearly the front-runner for the nomination, the decision, if not overturned by the full convention, threatened his chances of being selected.

In a tense and dramatic balloting session the next day, the committee voted 71 to 61 to unseat fifty-nine Chicago delegates, including Daley, on grounds that the procedures under which they had been selected violated five of the party's reform guidelines. Most of the Illinois delegates challenging Daley supported McGovern.

The emotional credentials challenges were considered on the first night of the convention. Twenty-three challenges from fifteen states were brought to the convention floor, but the spotlight was on the California and Illinois cases. A key preliminary vote took place on a challenge to the South Carolina delegation brought by the National Women's Political Caucus. The challenge, seeking to increase the number of women in the state delegation, was rejected by a vote of 1,555.75 to 1,429.05. (Table, p. 730.)

The outcome of the vote could have set an important precedent on what constituted a majority on subsequent challenges. Anti-McGovern forces had hoped to get a ruling from the chair allowing an absolute majority of 1,509 delegates to prevail rather than a simple majority of delegates actually voting.

Convention chairman Lawrence F. O'Brien (also chairman of the Democratic National Committee) had announced earlier that a majority would consist of one-half plus one of the number of eligible voters. The rules provided that no delegates could vote on their own credentials challenges.

Because the winning total on the South Carolina vote exceeded by a wide margin both the eligible majority and the absolute majority of the convention's 3,016 votes, the anti-McGovern coalition was unable to force a test of what constituted a majority. Thus the vote, although it rejected the position of South Carolina challengers favorable to McGovern, set the stage for returning the 151 California delegates to McGovern. The McGovern forces subsequently won the crucial California challenge, 1,618.28 to 1,238.22. (Table, p. 730.)

Following the defeat of a compromise in the Chicago case, a minority report asking for seating of the Daley delegates alone, was defeated 1,486.04 to 1,371.56. The vote seated a group, a majority of whom supported McGovern, headed by Chicago alderman William Singer and African American activist Jesse L. Jackson. (Table, p. 730.)

No other roll-call votes were needed to resolve the remaining credentials challenges. After the settlement of all the delegate contests, the convention had a composition unlike that of any previous major party convention. The 1972 Democratic assembly was the largest in major party history, with 3,203 delegates casting 3,016 votes. Unlike the situation in 1968, most delegates were chosen in state primary elections rather than in state conventions or caucuses. Nearly two-thirds of the delegates to the 1972 convention were selected in primaries, while only 41 percent had been elected by the primary system four years earlier, when Humphrey won the Democratic nomination without entering any primaries.

There were also large increases in the number of women, youth, and racial minorities at the 1972 convention. The proportion of women delegates rose from 13 percent in 1968 to 40 percent in 1972; the number of youth delegates (age thirty and under) dramatically jumped from 2.6 percent in 1968 to 21 percent four years later; and black delegates made up 15 percent of the 1972 convention, compared with 5.5 percent in 1968. But while women, youth, and blacks were better represented than at earlier conventions, there was a lower level of participation by elected party officials. Only thirty of the 255 Democratic members of the House of Representatives were present in Miami Beach.

The report of the rules committee was approved on the second day of the convention by a voice vote. The report proposed the abolition of winner-take-all primaries in 1976; the abolition of cross-over voting by Republicans in future Democratic presidential primaries; the selection of a woman as chairman of the 1976 convention, with the job rotating between the sexes thereafter; the creation of a special fund in the Democratic National Committee to subsidize the expenses of poor delegates at future national conventions and other party councils; and the appointment of a commission to make "appropriate revisions" in the reform guidelines.

Although the delegates overwhelmingly accepted these reforms, they balked at approving the party charter drafted by the rules committee. The new charter, the first ever written for a major party, was intended to free the national party of four-year presidential election cycles and to broaden public involvement in major national policy questions. But the charter was opposed by some party leaders, particularly members of Congress, who viewed the document as shifting power from elected politicians to the grassroots level. By a vote of 2,408.45 to 195.10, the convention approved a compromise resolution to delay consideration of the charter until a proposed midterm policy conference in 1974. The compromise also enlarged the Democratic National Committee and revised its membership to reflect Democratic strength in the various states.

The settlement of the California challenge on the opening night of the convention in favor of the McGovern forces effectively locked up the presidential nomination for the South Dakota senator. The next day, two of his major rivals in the primaries, Senators Humphrey and Muskie, withdrew from the race. In the balloting on the third day of the convention, McGovern was an easy winner on the first roll call. Before switches, McGovern had received 1,728.35 votes to 525 for Sen. Henry M. Jackson of Washington, 381.7 for Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama, and 151.95 for Rep. Shirley Chisholm of New York. After vote changes, McGovern's vote total rose to 1,864.95, but no attempt was made to make his nomination unanimous. (Table, p. 731.)

With McGovern's first choice for vice president, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, rebuffing all overtures, McGovern selected Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton of Missouri. The vice-presidential balloting was prolonged by the nomination of six other candidates, and, by the time the roll call was suspended, votes were distributed among more than seventy different "candidates." Eagleton received 1,741.81 votes, a majority. On the motion of Frances T. "Sissy" Farenthold, the runner-up, the roll call was suspended and Eagleton was nominated by acclamation.

Because of the long vice-presidential roll call, it was nearly 3 a.m. East Coast time before McGovern was able to deliver his acceptance speech, costing him the prime-time television audience. In the speech, he stressed the antiwar theme that was a basic part of his campaign and implored the nation to "come home" to its founding ideals.

Barely ten days after selection of the Democratic ticket, on July 25, Eagleton disclosed that he voluntarily had hospitalized himself three times between 1960 and 1966 for "nervous exhaustion and fatigue." McGovern strongly supported his running mate at the time, but in the following days, his support for the Missouri senator began to wane. After meeting with McGovern on July 31, Eagleton withdrew from the ticket. It marked the first time since 1860 that a major party candidate had withdrawn from a national ticket after the convention had adjourned.

On August 5 McGovern announced that his choice to replace Eagleton was R. Sargent Shriver of Maryland, U.S. ambassador to France and the former director of the Peace Corps and the Office of Economic Opportunity. The newly enlarged Democratic National Committee formally nominated Shriver in an August 8 meeting in Washington.

The 1972 Democratic platform was probably the most liberal and the longest (about 25,000 words) ever offered by a major political party. The platform was more a collection of independent reform proposals than a unified plan of action. Its recommendations, largely written by separate subject-area task forces, did not translate into a compact program for Congress to consider or for a president to propose. But the platform's common themes reflected the changes in the party since 1968 and set it off from all other Democratic platforms of the previous generation.

The National Welfare Rights Organization sponsored a measure requiring the federal government to guarantee every family of four an annual income of $6,500. It lost, 1,852.86 to 999.34. (Table, p. 731.)

The platform's position on the Vietnam War was blunt and unequivocal. As "the first order of business" of a Democratic administration, the platform pledged "immediate and complete withdrawal of all U.S. forces in Indochina." The plank also promised an end to military aid to the Saigon regime but pledged economic assistance to Vietnam to help the nation emerge from the war. Amnesty for war resisters was recommended after the return of American prisoners of war.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1972:

Vietnam. We believe that war is a waste of human life. We are determined to end forthwith a war which has cost 50,000 American lives, $150 billion of our resources, that has divided us from each other, drained our national will and inflicted incalculable damage to countless people. We will end that war by a simple plan that need not be kept secret: The immediate total withdrawal of all Americans from Southeast Asia.

Vietnam Amnesty. To those who for reasons of conscience refused to serve in this war and were prosecuted or sought refuge abroad, we state our firm intention to declare an amnesty, on an appropriate basis, when the fighting has ceased and our troops and prisoners of war have returned.

Poverty. The next Democratic Administration must end the present welfare system and replace it with an income security program which places cash assistance in an appropriate context with all of the measures outlined above, adding up to an earned income approach to ensure each family an income substantially more than the poverty level defined in the area. Federal income assistance will supplement the income of working poor people and assure an adequate income for those unable to work.

Crime. There must be laws to control the improper use of hand guns. Four years ago a candidate for the presidency was slain by a hand gun. Two months ago, another candidate for that office was gravely wounded. Three out of four police officers killed in the line of duty are slain with hand guns. Effective legislation must include a ban on sale of hand guns known as Saturday night specials which are unsuitable for sporting purposes.

Free Expression and Privacy. The new Democratic Administration should bring an end to the pattern of political persecution and investigation, the use of high office as a pulpit for unfair attack and intimidation and the blatant efforts to control the poor and to keep them from acquiring additional economic security or political power.

The epidemic of wiretapping and electronic surveillance engaged in by the Nixon Administration and the use of grand juries for purposes of political intimidation must be ended. The rule of law and the supremacy of the Constitution, as these concepts have traditionally been understood, must be restored.

Rights of Women. Women historically have been denied a full voice in the evolution of the political and social institutions of this country and are therefore allied with all underrepresented groups in a common desire to form a more humane and compassionate society. The Democratic Party pledges the following:

- A priority effort to ratify the Equal Rights Amendment....
- Appointment of women to positions of top responsibilities in all branches of the federal government, to achieve an equitable ratio of women and men.

Presidential Elections. We favor a Constitutional change to abolish the Electoral College and to give every voter a direct and equal voice in Presidential elections. The amendment should provide for a runoff election, if no candidate received more than 40 percent of the popular vote.

Republicans

Six weeks after the Democratic convention, the Republicans gathered in the same Miami Beach convention hall. The August 21–23 convention, precisely programmed to make the most of free prime time, was a gigantic television spectacular from start to finish. The main business of the convention, the nomination of President Richard Nixon and Vice President Spiro T. Agnew to a second term, was a carefully planned ritual.

The selection of Miami Beach as the convention city provided as much drama as the convention itself. Initially the Republicans had chosen San Diego, Calif., as the host city, but the reluctance of that city to provide necessary facilities on schedule, coupled with the revelation that the International Telephone and Telegraph (ITT) Corp. had pledged as much as $400,000 in local contributions, led the Republican National Committee to move the convention to Miami Beach.

Despite the preliminary organizational problems, the atmosphere of the convention itself was almost euphoric, and the sessions proceeded with dispatch. The five sessions lasted only sixteen hours and fifty-nine minutes, compared with the thirty hours and eighteen minutes of the Democratic convention.

The one debate, which lasted only an hour, occurred over the adoption of new procedures for selecting national convention delegates. The Republican National Committee's preconvention rules committee approved a 1976 delegate-allocation plan initiated by Sen. John G. Tower of Texas and Rep. Jack F. Kemp of New York. The plan emphasized a state's Republican presidential vote in awarding bonus delegates. It was viewed as especially beneficial to small southern and western states. The convention rules committee amended the Tower-Kemp plan to make it more palatable to larger states by adding some bonus delegates for states electing Republican governors and members of Congress.

However, Rep. William A. Steiger of Wisconsin introduced a different plan, weighted more toward states electing Republican governors and members of Congress—a plan that would work to the advantage of the larger states. The debate on the contrasting plans focused on the question of whether states should be rewarded chiefly for delivering their electoral votes to a Republican presidential candidate or whether the bonus should be based to some extent on gubernatorial and congressional contests.

The dispute was in part a battle between liberals and conservatives. Final victory for the conservatives was achieved on a 910 to 434 roll-call vote that defeated the Steiger amendment. The reallocation formula adopted by the delegates would expand the 1976 convention to more than 2,000 delegates, compared with the 1,348 who went to Miami Beach in 1972.

The struggle over the delegate-allocation formula was the only sign of party division at the convention. Nixon was renominated on the third night, receiving 1,347 of the 1,348 votes. The only opposing vote was cast reluctantly by a delegate from New Mexico for Rep. Paul N. McCloskey Jr. of California, whose antiwar challenge of the president had fizzled after the year's first primary in New Hampshire. (Table, p. 732.)

One measure of the unity that surrounded the festive proceedings was the appearance of Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York to deliver Nixon's nominating speech. Rockefeller had become a loyal supporter of the president after having been his chief rival for the Republican nomination in 1960 and 1968.

Agnew was nominated the next night with 1,345 votes. There were two abstentions and one waggish vote for newscaster David Brinkley.

In his acceptance speech, Nixon combined a review of his first four years with promises for the next four and indirect but highly partisan attacks on his Democratic opponent, George McGovern. Nixon stressed that the choice in the upcoming election was "not between radical change and no change, the choice ... is between change that works and change that won't work."

The Republican platform provoked little discussion and was approved by a voice vote. Two amendments were offered. The first, which would have pledged a prohibition on deficit federal spending, was defeated by voice vote. The second, advocating self-determination for American Indians, was approved by voice vote with the consent of the platform committee chairman, Rep. John J. Rhodes of Arizona.

The document, approximately 20,000 words long, was generally moderate in its proposals and conservative in language, in contrast to the Democrats' liberal platform.

The actual drafting of the Republican platform was heavily influenced by the White House, and platform committee sessions were held behind closed doors. In contrast, the Democrats held ten regional hearings around the country, drafted their platform in public, and were required by party rules to produce a final version at least ten days before the convention opened.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1972:

Vietnam. We will continue to seek a settlement of the Vietnam War which will permit the people of Southeast Asia to live in peace under political arrangements of their own choosing. We take specific note of the remaining major obstacle to settlement—Hanoi's demand that the United States overthrow the Saigon government and impose a Communist-dominated government on the South Vietnamese. We stand unequivocally at the side of the President in his effort to negotiate honorable terms, and in his refusal to accept terms which would dishonor this country.

Vietnam Amnesty. We are proud of the men and women who wear our country's uniform, especially of those who have borne the burden of fighting a difficult and unpopular war. Here and now we reject all proposals to grant amnesty to those who have broken the law by evading military service. We reject the claim that those who fled are more deserving, or obeyed a higher morality, than those next in line who served in their places.

Tax Reform. We reject the deceitful tax "reform" cynically represented as one that would soak the rich, but in fact one that would sharply raise the taxes of millions of families in middle-income brackets as well. We reject as well the lavish spending promised by the opposition Party which would more than double the present budget of the United States Government. This, too, would cause runaway inflation or force heavy increases in personal taxes.

Gun Control. [We pledge to] safeguard the right of responsible citizens to collect, own and use firearms for legitimate purposes, including hunting, target shooting and self-defense. We will strongly support efforts of all law enforcement agencies to apprehend and prosecute to the limit of the law all those who use firearms in the commission of crimes.

Women's Rights. Continued ... support of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution, our Party being the first national party to back this Amendment.

School Prayer. We reaffirm our view that voluntary prayer should be freely permitted in public places—particularly, by school children while attending public schools—provided that such prayers are not prepared or prescribed by the state or any of its political subdivisions and that no person's participation is coerced, thus preserving the traditional separation of church and state.

Health. To assure access to basic medical care for all our people, we support a program financed by employers, employees and the Federal Government to provide comprehensive health insurance coverage, including insurance against the cost of long-term and catastrophic illnesses and accidents and renal failure which necessitates dialysis, at a cost which all Americans can afford....

We oppose nationalized compulsory health insurance. This approach would at least triple in taxes the amount the average citizen now pays for health and would deny families the right to choose the kind of care they prefer. Ultimately it would lower the overall quality of health care for all Americans.

Democrats

Jimmy Carter, whose presidential primary campaign flouted Democratic Party regulars, brought the party's diverse elements together July 12–15 in a show of unaccustomed unity. The four-day 1976 convention in New York City was the party's most harmonious in twelve years and a stark contrast to the bitter and divisive conventions of 1968 and 1972.

The spirit of harmony was evident in the committee reports. No credentials challenges were carried to the convention floor and just one minority plank to the platform was offered. Only the rules committee report sparked much debate, and it was muted compared with the emotional struggles in the previous two conventions.

The lack of a spirited competition for the presidential nomination was an important factor in the absence of credentials challenges. However, the groundwork for the harmonious atmosphere had been established months earlier, when the Democratic National Committee adopted new delegate-selection and convention rules.

The delegate-selection rules abolished the implicit quota system that had been the basis of most challenges in 1972. The only basis for a challenge in 1976 was the violation of a state's delegate-selection or affirmative action plan to ensure the fair representation of minorities. Because all states had their plans approved by the national committee's Compliance Review Commission, the credentials committee was not weighing the fairness of the plan but merely whether the state party had implemented it. In reverse of the 1972 system, the burden of proof was on the challenging individual or group, not on the state parties.

The task of challengers was further impeded by the action of the national committee in October 1975, raising the petition requirement for convention minority reports from 10 percent to 25 percent of credentials committee members.

The stringent new rules had an effect on the demographic composition of the convention. A postconvention survey by the national committee indicated that 36 percent of the delegates in 1976 were women, compared with 38 percent in 1972; 7 percent were African American compared with 15 percent four years earlier, and 14 percent were youths, compared with 21 percent in 1972.

The first roll call of the convention came on a rules committee minority report that would have permitted extended debate on the platform. The measure was promoted by party liberals, who complained that the restrictive convention rules cut off their chance for full debate. They urged platform debate on a maximum of three issues for a total of one hour, if at least three hundred delegates from ten states signed a petition for such issues. The proposal called for debate only; no votes would have been taken.

Carter delegates, though, were nearly unanimous in their opposition, fearing that adoption of the minority report would unduly lengthen the proceedings. The convention rejected the minority report by a vote of 735 to 1,957½.

Liberals had better luck when the rules relating to future conventions were considered. By voice votes, they won approval of majority reports to establish the party's new Judicial Council as an arbiter of party rules and to eliminate the controversial loophole primary.

A loophole primary permitted election of delegates on a winner-take-all basis at the congressional district level. Carter and Democratic National Chairman Robert S. Strauss both favored the minority report, which called simply for review of the loophole primary by the newly established Commission on the Role and Future of Presidential Primaries, headed by Michigan state chairman Morley Winograd.

Liberals argued that this was not enough. They claimed that the loophole primary violated the party charter, which required proportional representation. Their position prevailed in the rules committee by a razor-thin margin of 58½ to 58 ¼. Although Carter managers were unhappy with the majority report, they did not press for a roll call and the convention approved it by voice vote.

But the convention rejected on roll-call votes liberal amendments to mandate the size and agenda of the party's 1978 midterm conference and to lower the minority report requirement at future conventions. The minority report on the 1978 conference would have required a prescribed agenda that included the discussion of policy matters. It also would have mandated a conference of at least 2,000 delegates, two-thirds of them elected at the congressional district level. On the roll call the proposal ran ahead 1,240 to 1,128, but it failed because of convention rules requiring a constitutional majority of 1,505 votes.

Another roll call came on the unsuccessful attempt by liberal delegates to have the minority report requirement at future conventions lowered from 25 percent to 15 percent of convention committee members. It was rejected, 1,249 to 1,354½.

Potentially the most explosive of the rules issues, regarding a "female quota" at future conventions, was settled in behind-the-scenes meetings between Carter and representatives of the women's caucus. At a rules committee meeting in Washington, D.C., in late June, the women's caucus had demanded equal representation with men in state delegations at future conventions. The Carter forces balked at this. Carter's views prevailed in the rules committee, which urged each state to promote equal division between the sexes but left the implementation of the rule to each state party. The women's caucus filed a minority report.

Both sides expressed a willingness to compromise, and in New York City on July 11 and 12 Carter met with representatives of the women's caucus. They reached a compromise that encouraged—but did not require—equal representation for women at the party's midterm conference and at future conventions. Language was inserted calling for the national committee to "encourage and assist" state parties in achieving equal division.

The compromise also included agreements between Carter and the women on other questions. Carter promised to establish an independent women's division in the party outside the realm of the chairman and pledged full party representation for women. The candidate promised to work for the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment and pledged high government positions for women. With acceptance of this compromise by the women's caucus, the minority report was withdrawn and the compromise language on equal division was worked into the majority report.

Balloting for president came on July 14, the third day of the convention, but it was merely a formality. Carter had locked up the nomination more than a month earlier when he won the June 8 Ohio primary, a victory that prompted a cascade of endorsements and stymied his remaining opposition. Besides Carter, three other names were placed in nomination: Rep. Morris K. Udall of Arizona, Carter's most persistent primary challenger; Gov. Edmund G. "Jerry" Brown Jr. of California; and antiabortion crusader Ellen McCormack of New York. The proceedings, though, turned into a love-feast as Udall before the balloting and Brown afterward appeared at the convention to declare their support for Carter.

On the presidential roll call, Carter received 2,238½ of the convention's 3,008 votes, topping the needed majority little more than halfway through the balloting with the vote from Ohio. Udall finished second with 329½ votes, followed by Brown with 300½, Gov. George C. Wallace of Alabama with 57, and McCormack with 22. The rest of the vote was scattered. After completion of the roll call—and vote switches in California, Rhode Island, and Louisiana—a motion to make the nomination unanimous was approved by voice vote. (Table, p. 733.)

The following morning Carter announced that his choice for vice president was Sen. Walter F. Mondale of Minnesota. Carter noted that it was a difficult decision, admitting that he had changed his mind three times in the previous thirty days.

In explaining his choice, Carter cited Mondale's experience and political philosophy, his concept of the presidency, and the preparation Mondale had made for his interview with Carter. Most of all, Carter emphasized compatibility, saying, "It's a very sure feeling that I have."

Mondale was one of seven prospective running mates Carter had personally interviewed. At his home in Plains, Georgia, Carter had interviewed, besides Mondale, Sens. Edmund S. Muskie (Maine) and John Glenn (Ohio). At the New York convention he interviewed Sens. Henry M. Jackson (Washington), Frank Church (Idaho), and Adlai E. Stevenson III (Illinois), and Rep. Peter W. Rodino Jr. (New Jersey). Rodino withdrew his name from consideration shortly after his interview.

Like the presidential roll call the previous night, the balloting for vice president on July 15 was a formality. Mondale had only one declared opponent, Gary Benoit, a Massachusetts college student and a Wallace delegate. Two others were nominated but withdrew—Rep. Ronald V. Dellums of California and Vietnam War resister Fritz Efav of Oklahoma. Dellums, an African American from Oakland, appeared personally to withdraw his name and used the opportunity to plead with Carter to pay attention to the needs of minorities at home and to third world aspirations abroad.

On the roll call, Mondale swamped his rivals, receiving 2,817 votes, more than 90 percent of the convention total. Retiring House Speaker Carl Albert finished a distant second with 36 votes, all cast as a complimentary gesture by his home state delegation. Rep. Barbara C. Jordan, an African American from Houston, followed with 28 votes, an apparent tribute to her dramatic keynote address.

Following the balloting, Mondale delivered his acceptance speech and succeeded in arousing the delegates with a partisan oratorical style reminiscent of his Minnesota mentor, Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey.

"We have just lived through the worst scandal in American history," Mondale declared, "and are now led by a president who pardoned the person who did it." His reference to the Watergate affair and to the Nixon pardon brought the delegates to their feet.

Carter's acceptance speech, unlike Mondale's, was not a rousing one in the traditional sense. But Carter was able to begin his address before 11 p.m., in the prime television slot that Strauss had promised as a contrast to George McGovern's nearly unheard 3 a.m. acceptance speech in 1972.

The 1976 platform had been carefully constructed by the Carter forces at platform committee meetings in Washington, D.C., in June. The ninety-page document was something of a throwback to earlier years—a broad statement of party goals rather than a list of legislative programs and controversial stands on issues. The platform and the care with which it was written reflected the Democrats' determination to avoid the platform fights and issues that proved costly to the party in the previous two elections.

Unlike 1972, when there was sharp, divisive debate on twenty minority planks, only one minority plank—on revising the 1939 Hatch Act to allow federal employees to run for political office and participate in partisan campaigns—was presented to the delegates in Madison Square Garden. It was approved by the Carter forces and was adopted by a voice vote after minimal debate.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1976:

Economy. To meet our goals we must set annual targets for employment, production and price stability; the Federal Reserve must be made a full partner in national economic decisions and become responsive to the economic goals of Congress and the President....

Full Employment. We have met the goals of full employment with stable prices in the past and can do it again. The Democratic Party is committed to the right of all adult Americans willing, able and seeking work to have opportunities for useful jobs at living wages. To make that commitment meaningful, we pledge ourselves to the support of legislation that will make every responsible effort to reduce adult unemployment to 3 percent within 4 years....

Government Reform. The Democratic Party is committed to the adoption of reforms such as zero-based budgeting, mandatory reorganization timetables, and sunset laws which do not jeopardize the implementation of basic human and political rights.

An Office of Citizen Advocacy should be established as part of the executive branch, independent of any agency, with full access to agency records and with both the power and the responsibility to investigate complaints.

We support the revision of the Hatch Act so as to extend to federal workers the same political rights enjoyed by other Americans as a birthright, while still protecting the Civil Service from political abuse.

We call for legislative action to provide for partial public financing on a matching basis of the congressional elections, and the exploration of further reforms to insure the integrity of the electoral process.

Health. We need a comprehensive national health insurance system with universal and mandatory coverage. Such a national health insurance system should be financed by a combination of employer-employee shared payroll taxes and general tax revenues. Consideration should be given to developing a means of support for national health insurance that taxes all forms of economic income.

Welfare Reform. We should move toward replacement of our existing inadequate and wasteful system with a simplified system of income maintenance, substantially financed by the federal government, which includes a requirement that those able to work be provided with appropriate available jobs or job training opportunities. Those persons who are physically able to work (other than mothers with dependent children) should be required to accept appropriate available jobs or job training.

As an interim step, and as a means of providing immediate federal fiscal relief to state and local governments, local governments should no longer be required to bear the burden of welfare costs. Further, there should be a phased reduction in the states' share of welfare costs.

Civil Rights and Liberties. We pledge effective and vigorous action to protect citizens' privacy from bureaucratic and technological intrusions, such as wiretapping and bugging without judicial scrutiny and supervision; and a full and complete pardon for those who are in legal or financial jeopardy because of their peaceful opposition to the Vietnam War, with deserters to be considered on a case-by-case basis.

We fully recognize the religious and ethical nature of the concerns which many Americans have on the subject of abortion. We feel, however, that it is undesirable to attempt to amend the U.S. Constitution to overturn the Supreme Court decision in this area.

Gun Control. Handguns simplify and intensify violent crime. Ways must be found to curtail the availability of these weapons. The Democratic Party must provide the leadership for a coordinated federal and state effort to strengthen the presently inadequate controls over the manufacture, assembly, distribution and possession of handguns and to ban Saturday night specials.

Furthermore, since people and not guns commit crimes, we support mandatory sentencing for individuals convicted of committing a felony with a gun.

The Democratic Party, however, affirms the right of sportsmen to possess guns for purely hunting and target-shooting purposes.

Energy. The Democratic energy platform begins with a recognition that the federal government has an important role to play in insuring the nation's energy future, and that it must be given the tools it needs to protect the economy and the nation's consumers from arbitrary and excessive energy price increases and help the nation embark on a massive domestic energy program focusing on conservation, coal conversion, exploration and development of new technologies to insure an adequate short-term and long-term supply of energy for the nation's needs....

The huge reserves of oil, gas and coal on federal territory, including the outer continental shelf, belong to all the people. The Republicans have pursued leasing policies which give the public treasury the least benefit and the energy industry the most benefit from these public resources. Consistent with environmentally sound practices, new leasing procedures must be adopted to correct these policies, as well as insure the timely development of existing leases....

We also support the legal prohibition against corporate ownership of competing types of energy, such as oil and coal. We believe such "horizontal" concentration of economic power to be dangerous both to the national interest and to the functioning of the competitive system.

Environment. The Democratic Party's strong commitment to environmental quality is based on its conviction that environmental protection is not simply an aesthetic goal, but is necessary to achieve a more just society. Cleaning up air and water supplies and controlling the proliferation of dangerous chemicals is a necessary part of a successful national health program. Protecting the worker from workplace hazards is a key element of our full employment program....

Latin America. We must make clear our revulsion at the systematic violations of basic human rights that have occurred under some Latin American military regimes.

We pledge support for a new Panama Canal treaty, which insures the interests of the United States in that waterway, recognizes the principles already agreed upon, takes into account the interests of the Canal workforce, and which will have wide hemispheric support.

Republicans

After four boisterous, raucous, and sometimes tearful days, Republicans ended their 1976 national convention on a positive note absent during most of a gathering characterized by strident attacks on the Democrats and the Congress they controlled. Delegates arrived in Kansas City, Mo., for the August 16–19 convention more evenly split than they had been since 1952, when Dwight D. Eisenhower edged Sen. Robert A. Taft of Ohio (1939–1953) for the GOP nomination. Both major rivals for the nomination, President Gerald R. Ford (breaking with tradition) and former California governor Ronald Reagan, arrived in town three days before the balloting to continue their pursuit of delegates.

Ford, relying heavily on the prestige of the presidency that sometimes had failed to produce results during the seven-month campaign, invited a number of wavering delegates to his hotel suite in the new Crown Center Hotel while Reagan also courted delegates personally.

By a margin of 111 votes on August 17, the Reagan forces lost the first and probably the most important roll call of the convention. The vote came on a Reagan-sponsored amendment to the rules committee report that would have required all presidential candidates to name their running mates before the presidential balloting the next night.

The idea of a test vote on the vice-presidential question was sprung by Reagan's campaign manager, John Sears, barely a week before the convention, when on August 9 he appeared before the rules committee and urged that the proposal be included as Section C of Rule 16. The amendment was clearly aimed at throwing Ford on the defensive, because Reagan had designated Sen. Richard S. Schweiker of Pennsylvania as his running mate on July 26. Under the proposal, failure of a candidate to comply would have freed all delegates from any commitments to vote for him.

The convention debate and vote on Rule 16C was the focal point of the August 17 session. Supporters characterized the proposal as a "right-to-know" amendment. "A presidential candidate must tell us who's on his team before we are expected to join him," argued former Missouri representative Thomas B. Curtis, the sponsor of the amendment. "The delegates have the right to be consulted for a day of decision that will have an impact for years to come."

Speakers against the amendment countered that it was solely a maneuver of the Reagan forces and that any vice-presidential selection reform should be deliberately considered on its merits.

The final count stood at 1,069 in favor of the amendment and 1,180 against, with ten abstentions. The vote was the first tangible evidence of Ford's strength at the convention and paved the way for his nomination. (Table, p. 734.)

On the presidential roll call August 18, the final vote was 1,187 for Ford, 1,070 for Reagan, one vote from the New York delegation for Commerce Secretary Elliot L. Richardson, and one abstention. (Table, p. 734.) On a voice vote the convention made the nomination unanimous.

Ford added to the partisan style of the Republican ticket the next day by selecting Sen. Robert J. "Bob" Dole of Kansas as his running mate after Reagan ruled out his acceptance of the second spot. While little mentioned during speculation about Ford's vice-presidential choice, Dole, a former chairman of the Republican National Committee, was seen as an effective gut fighter who would allow Ford to keep his campaign style presidential in the battle against Carter.

Vice President Nelson A. Rockefeller nominated his potential successor, telling the crowd that the Kansas senator not only could stand the heat of political battle, but also could "really dole it out." Rockefeller, unpopular with conservatives, had not sought to continue in the job he had gained through appointment in 1974.

On the vice-presidential roll call, Dole received 1,921 of the convention's 2,259 votes. Sen. Jesse A. Helms of North Carolina, a hero of the conservatives, finished a distant second with 103 votes. The remaining votes were scattered among twenty-nine other "candidates."

Ford's acceptance speech concentrated on his record since taking office in mid-1974. The president took credit for cutting inflation in half, increasing employment to a record level, and bringing the country to peace.

Ford diverged from his prepared text to issue a direct challenge to Carter. "I'm ready, eager to go before the American people and debate the real issues face to face with Jimmy Carter," the president said. "The American people have the right to know first-hand exactly where both of us stand." No major party presidential nominees had debated since the Kennedy-Nixon debates in 1960.

By the time the convention got around to debating the platform the night of August 17, an expected bitter struggle between Ford and Reagan forces had been deflated by the earlier vote on rules. The arena, which had been packed two hours earlier, held a somewhat smaller crowd after midnight. Many Ford delegates in particular, confident that they had won the main event, left while members of the platform committee presented the sixty-five-page document.

Two minority planks were offered, in accordance with platform committee rules that required petitions signed by 25 percent of the members. The first, sponsored by Ann F. Peckham of Wisconsin, called for deleting all platform references to abortion. The committee-approved section supported a constitutional amendment "to restore protection of the right to life of unborn children." After a twelve-minute debate, the minority plank was defeated by voice vote and the abortion language stayed in.

The second minority report, a six-paragraph addition to the foreign policy section, was sponsored by thirty-four Reagan supporters on the platform committee. Without mentioning names, it criticized President Ford and Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger for losing public confidence, making secret international agreements, and discouraging the hope of freedom for those who did not have it—presumably captive nations.

Many of Ford's supporters, including Rep. John B. Anderson of Illinois and Senate minority leader Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, earlier had expressed strong opposition to the "morality in foreign policy" plank, as it came to be called. Ford's floor leader, Sen. Robert P. Griffin of Michigan, and Rep. David C. Treen of Louisiana sought compromise language in informal negotiations on the floor. But the Reagan forces, led by Senator Helms, were adamant.

Not wishing to offend the Reagan contingent further, Ford's supporters decided not to fight. Sen. Roman L. Hruska of Nebraska, chairman of the foreign policy subcommittee, announced from the podium that there would be no organized opposition to the plank. It was passed by voice vote. The convention then approved the platform.

The document reflected the nearly equal influence of President Ford and Ronald Reagan at the convention. It was a traditional Republican blueprint for limited government—a clear contrast with the Democratic platform.

Ordinarily, the platform of the party holding the White House heaps praise on the incumbent president and boasts of the way he has led the nation. This Republican platform did not. With Ford embroiled in a contest for the nomination, the platform writers chose to mention him by name only a few times. Richard Nixon was never mentioned. There were only vague references to Watergate.

Following are excerpts from the Republican Party platform of 1976:

Economy. We believe it is of paramount importance that the American people understand that the number one destroyer of jobs is inflation.

Republicans hope every American realizes that if we are to permanently eliminate high unemployment, it is essential to protect the integrity of our money. That means putting an end to deficit spending.

Wage and price controls are not the solution to inflation. They attempt to treat only the symptom—rising prices—not the cause. Historically, controls have always been a dismal failure, and in the end they create only shortages, black markets and higher prices. For these reasons the Republican Party strongly opposes any reimposition of such controls, on a standby basis or otherwise....

Government Reform. There must be functional realignment of government, instead of the current arrangement by subject areas or constituencies.

Revenue Sharing is an effort to reverse the trend toward centralization. Revenue Sharing must continue without unwarranted federal strictures and regulations.

Block grant programs should be extended to replace many existing categorical health, education, child nutrition and social programs.

While we oppose a uniform national primary, we encourage the concept of regional presidential primaries, which would group those states which voluntarily agree to have presidential primaries in a geographical area on a common date.

Criminal Justice. Each state should have the power to decide whether it wishes to impose the death penalty for certain crimes. All localities are urged to tighten their bail practices and to review their sentencing and parole procedures.

Gun Control. We support the right of citizens to keep and bear arms. We oppose federal registration of firearms. Mandatory sentences for crimes committed with a lethal weapon are the only effective solution to this problem.

Civil Rights and Liberties. The Republican Party reaffirms its support for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment. Our Party was the first national party to endorse the E.R.A. in 1940. We continue to believe its ratification is essential to insure equal rights for all Americans.

The Republican Party favors a continuance of the public dialogue on abortion and supports the efforts of those who seek enactment of a constitutional amendment to restore protection of the right to life for unborn children.

Welfare Reform. We oppose federalizing the welfare system; local levels of government are most aware of the needs of their communities.

We also oppose the guaranteed annual income concept or any programs that reduce the incentive to work.

Those features of the present law, particularly the food stamp program, that draw into assistance programs people who are capable of paying for their own needs should be corrected. The humanitarian purpose of such programs must not be corrupted by eligibility loopholes.

Health. We support extension of catastrophic illness protection to all who cannot obtain it. We should utilize our private health insurance system to assure adequate protection for those who do not have it. Such an approach will eliminate the red tape and high bureaucratic costs inevitable in a comprehensive national program.

The Republican Party opposes compulsory national health insurance.

Energy. One fact should now be clear: We must reduce sharply our dependence on other nations for energy and strive to achieve energy independence at the earliest possible date. We cannot allow the economic destiny and international policy of the United States to be dictated by the sovereign powers that control major portions of the world's petroleum supplies....

Foreign Policy. We recognize and commend that great beacon of human courage and morality, Alexander Solzhenitsyn, for his compelling message that we must face the world with no illusions about the nature of tyranny. Ours will be a foreign policy that keeps this ever in mind.

Ours will be a foreign policy which recognizes that in international negotiations we must make no undue concessions; that in pursuing détente we must not grant unilateral favors with only the hope of getting future favors in return.

Agreements that are negotiated, such as the one signed in Helsinki, must not take from those who do not have freedom the hope of one day gaining it.

Finally, we are firmly committed to a foreign policy in which secret agreements, hidden from our people, will have no part.

Latin America. By continuing its policies of exporting subversion and violence, Cuba remains outside the Inter-American family of nations. We condemn attempts by the Cuban dictatorship to intervene in the affairs of other nations; and, as long as such conduct continues, it shall remain ineligible for admission to the Organization of American States.

The United States intends that the Panama Canal be preserved as an international waterway for the ships of all nations.... In any talks with Panama, however, the United States negotiators should in no way cede, dilute, forfeit, negotiate or transfer any rights, power, authority, jurisdiction, territory or property that are necessary for the protection and security of the United States and the entire Western Hemisphere.

Republicans

Ronald Reagan, the sixty-nine-year-old former California governor, was installed as the Republican presidential nominee at the party's national convention, but his moment of glory nearly was overshadowed by an unusual flap over the number-two spot. The choosing of Reagan's running mate provided the only suspense at the GOP convention, held July 14–17 in Detroit's Joe Louis Arena.

Who would fill the number-one spot had been determined long before when Reagan won twenty-eight of the thirty-four Republican presidential primaries and eliminated all of his major rivals. The last to withdraw—George H.W. Bush—was tapped by Reagan July 16 as his ticket mate in a dramatic postmidnight appearance before the delegates.

For most of the evening of July 16, it looked as though Gerald R. Ford would occupy the second spot on the ticket, which would have made him the first former president to run for vice president. A number of Republicans had described the combination as a “dream ticket.” Groups of Reagan and Ford supporters had met four times to “discuss” the possibility of forging a Reagan-Ford ticket.

The discussions reportedly centered around providing a role for Ford somewhat akin to the White House chief of staff’s. Ford further fed the speculation, offering a simple solution to the temporary problem that would have been posed by the Twelfth Amendment to the Constitution. The amendment would have had the effect of prohibiting the members of the electoral college from California from voting for both Reagan and Ford because both were California residents. The amendment says that the electors from any state must vote for at least one person who is not from that state. Ford said Reagan’s lawyers had researched the residency question and determined that legally there would be no problem if the former president changed his residence to Michigan, which he represented in the House for twenty-five years, or to Colorado, where he owned a home.

As the evening of July 16 wore on, the speculation heightened. About 9:15 p.m. Reagan telephoned Ford to ask him to make up his mind whether he wanted the vice president’s job. Meanwhile, convention officials proceeded to call the roll of the states, and Reagan received enough votes to become the official nominee.

But at about 11:15 p.m. the Reagan-Ford arrangement fell apart. Ford went to Reagan’s suite in the Detroit Plaza Hotel and the two men agreed that it would be better for Ford to campaign for the GOP ticket rather than be a member of it. “His [Ford’s] instinct told him it was not the thing to do,” Reagan said later.

When it became apparent that efforts to persuade Ford to join the ticket had failed, Reagan turned to Bush, a moderate with proven vote-getting ability. The Reagan camp refused to acknowledge that Bush had been the second choice, even though it was widely perceived that way. “There was everybody else and then the Ford option,” Edwin Meese, Reagan’s chief of staff, said later.

Bush had been Reagan’s most persistent competitor through the long primary season, but he won only six primaries—Michigan, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, the District of Columbia, and Puerto Rico. Bush was one of the vice-presidential possibilities favored by those in the party who believed that Reagan had to reach outside the GOP’s conservative wing if he were to have broad appeal in November.

Bush supporters said that his Texas residency would balance the ticket geographically and that his extensive government service would overcome criticism that Reagan did not have any Washington experience. Bush served from 1967 to 1971 in the U.S. House and had been ambassador to the United Nations, head of the U.S. liaison office in Peking, and director of the Central Intelligence Agency.

The Republican Party’s 1980 platform was more a blueprint for victory in November than a definitive statement of party views. Rather than slug it out over specifics, the party’s moderate and conservative wings agreed to blur their differences to appear united, to broaden the party’s appeal and to smooth Reagan’s way to the White House.

Overwhelmingly, platform committee members agreed the document should be consistent with Reagan’s positions. Thus, though one media poll found delegates overwhelmingly in favor of resuming a peacetime draft, the platform bowed to the view of its nominee and stated its opposition to a renewal of the draft “at this time.” In the same manner, the party’s platform took no position on ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution. Since 1940 Republican platforms had supported an ERA amendment. Reagan, however, opposed ratification, and ERA opponents far outnumbered the amendment’s supporters on the platform committee. Yet Reagan, in a gesture to moderates, suggested that the platform not take a position on the issue, and the committee agreed.

Most of the platform document consisted of policy statements on which most Republicans agreed. There were calls for tax cuts, pleas for less government regulation, and harsh criticisms of the Carter administration. In two areas, however, the platform took a particularly hard-line position. The platform supported a constitutional amendment that would outlaw abortion and called on a Reagan administration to appoint federal judges who opposed abortion. On defense, platform writers took an already hard-line plank that had been drafted by party staff and moved it sharply to the right. The platform called for massive increases in defense spending and scoffed at the Carter administration’s proposed Strategic Arms Limitation Treaty (SALT II).

On the other hand, to pick up votes from organized labor, African Americans, and the poor, the platform made some new overtures to those traditionally non-Republican groups. It pledged to strengthen enforcement of the civil rights laws, made overtures to U.S. workers put out of their jobs by competition from foreign imports, and promised to save America’s inner cities.

The platform was adopted by the convention July 15 without change, but not before an unsuccessful attempt was made to reopen on the floor one of its more controversial sections: the section suggesting that Reagan appoint federal judges who opposed abortion. Sen. Charles H. Percy of Illinois called it “the worst plank I have ever seen in any platform by the Republican Party.” The moderates sought to round up support for reopening the platform on the floor, but their efforts failed.

Ronald Reagan received the Republican nomination on the first ballot. (Table, p. 735.)

In his acceptance speech, Reagan combined sharp jabs at the alleged shortcomings of the Carter administration with a reaffirmation of his conservative credo. Reagan cited three grave threats to the nation's existence—"a disintegrating economy, a weakened defense, and an energy policy based on the sharing of scarcity." The culprits, Reagan contended, were President Carter and the Democratic Congress. He said they had preached that the American people needed to tighten their belts. "I utterly reject that view," he declared.

Following are excerpts from the Republican Party platform of 1980:

Taxes. ... [W]e believe it is essential to cut personal tax rates out of fairness to the individual...

Therefore, the Republican Party supports across-the-board reductions in personal income tax rates, phased in over three years, which will reduce tax rates from the range of 14 to 70 percent to a range of from 10 to 50 percent.

... Republicans will move to end tax bracket creep caused by inflation. We support tax indexing to protect taxpayers from the automatic tax increases caused when cost-of-living wage increases move them into higher tax brackets.

African Americans. During the next four years we are committed to policies that will:

- encourage local governments to designate specific enterprise zones within depressed areas that will promote new jobs, new and expanded businesses and new economic vitality;

- open new opportunities for black men and women to begin small businesses of their own by, among other steps, removing excessive regulations, disincentives for venture capital and other barriers erected by the government;

- bring strong, effective enforcement of federal civil rights statutes, especially those dealing with threats to physical safety and security which have recently been increasing; and

- ensure that the federal government follows a nondiscriminatory system of appointments ... with a careful eye for qualified minority aspirants.

Women's Rights. We acknowledge the legitimate efforts of those who support or oppose ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment.

We reaffirm our Party's historic commitment to equal rights and equality for women.

We support equal rights and equal opportunities for women, without taking away traditional rights of women such as exemption from the military draft. We support the enforcement of all equal opportunity laws and urge the elimination of discrimination against women.

We reaffirm our belief in the traditional role and values of the family in our society.... The importance of support for the mother and homemaker in maintaining the values of this country cannot be over-emphasized.

Abortion. While we recognize differing views on this question among Americans in general—and in our own Party—we affirm our support of a constitutional amendment to restore protection of the right to life for unborn children. We also support the Congressional efforts to restrict the use of taxpayers' dollars for abortion.

Education. ... [T]he Republican Party supports deregulation by the federal government of public education, and encourages the elimination of the federal Department of Education.

We support Republican initiatives in the Congress to restore the right of individuals to participate in voluntary, non-denominational prayer in schools and other public facilities....

Crime. We believe that the death penalty serves as an effective deterrent to capital crime and should be applied by the federal government and by states which approve it as an appropriate penalty for certain major crimes.

We believe the right of citizens to keep and bear arms must be preserved. Accordingly, we oppose federal registration of firearms. Mandatory sentences for commission of armed felonies are the most effective means to deter abuse of this right.

Foreign Competition. The Republican Party recognizes the need to provide workers who have lost their jobs because of technological obsolescence or imports the opportunity to adjust to changing economic conditions. In particular, we will seek ways to assist workers threatened by foreign competition.

The Republican Party believes that protectionist tariffs and quotas are detrimental to our economic well-being. Nevertheless, we insist that our trading partners offer our nation the same level of equity, access, and fairness that we have shown them.

Big Government. The Republican Party reaffirms its belief in the decentralization of the federal government and in the traditional American principle that the best government is the one closest to the people. There, it is less costly, more accountable, and more responsive to people's needs....

Energy. We are committed to ... a strategy of aggressively boosting the nation's energy supplies; stimulating new energy technology and more efficient energy use; restoring maximum feasible choice and freedom in the marketplace for energy consumers and producers alike; and eliminating energy shortages and disruptions....

Balanced Budget. If federal spending is reduced as tax cuts are phased in, there will be sufficient budget surpluses to fund the tax cuts, and allow for reasonable growth in necessary program spending.

... We believe a Republican President and a Republican Congress can balance the budget and reduce spending through legislative actions, eliminating the necessity for a Constitutional amendment to compel it. However, if necessary, the Republican Party will seek to adopt a Constitutional amendment to limit federal spending and balance the budget, except in time of national emergency as determined by a two-thirds vote of Congress.

National Security. Republicans commit themselves to an immediate increase in defense spending to be applied judiciously to critically needed programs. We will build toward a sustained defense expenditure sufficient to close the gap with the Soviets. Republicans approve and endorse a national strategy of peace through strength....

Nuclear Forces. ... We reject the mutual-assured-destruction (MAD) strategy of the Carter Administration.... We propose, instead, a credible strategy which will deter a Soviet attack by the clear capability of our forces to survive and ultimately to destroy Soviet military targets.

A Republican Administration will strive for early modernization of our theater nuclear forces so that a seamless web of deterrence can be maintained against all levels of attack, and our credibility with our European allies is restored.

Defense Manpower and the Draft. The Republican Party is not prepared to accept a peacetime draft at this time.... We will not consider a peacetime draft unless a well-managed, Congressionally-funded, full-scale effort to improve the all-volunteer force does not meet expectations.

The Americas. We deplore the Marxist Sandinista takeover of Nicaragua and the Marxist attempts to destabilize El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras. We do not support United States assistance to any Marxist government in this hemisphere and we oppose the Carter Administration aid program for the government of Nicaragua. However, we will support the efforts of the Nicaraguan people to establish a free and independent government.

Democrats

President Jimmy Carter emerged victorious from a deeply divided Democratic National Convention unsure whether his plea for unity to supporters of rival Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts had succeeded. Kennedy had been Carter's main opponent in his quest for renomination throughout the spring primary season. When it became apparent that Kennedy had not won in the primaries and caucuses the delegate support he needed, he turned his efforts to prying the nomination away from the president at the convention.

Kennedy's presence was strong throughout the convention week and expressions of support for the senator sometimes upstaged those for the incumbent president. Chants of "We want Ted" rocked off the walls of New York's Madison Square Garden during the convention's four days, August 11–14. Their echo faintly followed the president as he left the podium following his acceptance speech.

Kennedy's efforts to wrest the nomination from Carter centered around a proposed new convention rule that bound delegates to vote on the first ballot for the candidates under whose banner they were elected. When the convention opened, Carter could count 315 more votes than he needed for the nomination—votes that he had won in nominating caucuses and presidential primaries. As a result, Kennedy's only chance to gain the nomination was to defeat the binding rule.

Opponents of the binding rule argued that political conditions had changed since the delegates were elected months earlier and that to bind them would break with a century and a half of Democratic tradition.

But most Carter supporters scoffed at that contention, stressing that delegates were free to vote their conscience on all roll calls but the first one for president. Passage of the rule was simply fair play, they added. It had been adopted in 1978 without opposition by the party's most recent rules-review commission and the Democratic National Committee. Only when it was apparent that Carter was winning, claimed Atlanta mayor Maynard Jackson, did the Kennedy camp want to change the rules to allow a "fifth ball, a fourth out, or a tenth inning."

When the measure finally came to a vote, Carter forces turned back the attempt to overturn the proposed rule. The vote was 1,936.418 to 1,390.580 against Kennedy's position. (Table, p. 736.)

Shortly after the vote, Kennedy ended his nine-month challenge to the president by announcing that his name would not be placed in nomination August 13. Passage of the binding rule ensured Carter's renomination.

Despite the loss on the binding rule, the Kennedy camp succeeded in molding the party platform more to their liking. The final document was filled with so many concessions to the Kennedy forces that it won only a half-hearted endorsement from the president. The platform battle, one of the longest in party history, filled seventeen hours of debate and roll calls that stretched over two days, August 12 and 13.

Most of Carter's concessions and outright defeats came on the economic and human needs sections of the 40,000-word document. It was these revisions that Carter rejected—as diplomatically as possible—in a statement issued several hours after the debate wound to a close.

The marathon platform debate reached its high point on Tuesday evening, August 12, when Kennedy addressed the delegates in behalf of his minority report on the economic chapter. Kennedy's speech provided the Democratic convention with its most exciting moments. The address, which sparked a forty-minute emotional demonstration when it was over, called for Democratic unity and laced into the Republican nominee, Ronald Reagan.

Kennedy defended his liberal ideology, supporting national health insurance and federal spending to restore deteriorated urban areas. He lashed out at Reagan's proposal for a massive tax cut, labeling it as beneficial only to the wealthy. Buoyed by the Kennedy oratory, the convention went on to pass by voice vote three liberal Kennedy platform planks on the economy, thereby rejecting the more moderate versions favored by Carter.

The first of the Kennedy-sponsored planks was a statement pledging that fairness would be the overriding principle of the Democrats' economic policy and that no actions would be taken that would "significantly increase" unemployment. The convention next approved a Kennedy plank seeking a $12 billion antirecession jobs program, a $1 billion rail renewal plan, and an expanded housing program for low- and moderate-income families. The final Kennedy economic plank was a statement of opposition to fighting inflation through a policy of high interest rates and unemployment. Carter had agreed to this plank the day before the convention opened.

Carter floor managers realized that it would be difficult to block passage of the Kennedy economic proposals. After the senator's emotion-filled speech, Carter advisers—realizing their position could not prevail—quickly sought to change from a roll call to a voice vote on the economic planks.

During the floor demonstration that followed Kennedy's speech, a series of telephone calls ricocheted between the podium and the senator's campaign trailer located off the convention floor. The negotiations involved how many elements of the Kennedy program would be accepted by voice vote. In the end, Carter prevailed on only one of Kennedy's economic minority reports, the call for an immediate wage and price freeze followed by controls.

Shortly after Carter's renomination August 13, Kennedy issued a statement endorsing the platform and pledging his support for Carter. In the final moments before adjournment, Kennedy made a stiff and brief appearance on the platform with Carter, Vice President Walter F. Mondale, and a host of Democratic officeholders. But the coolness of his appearance—accompanied by the warmest reception of the night—left questionable the commitment of the senator and his supporters to work strenuously for Carter's reelection.

Carter won the Democratic nomination with 2,123 votes compared with Kennedy's 1,150.5. Other candidates split 54.5 votes. (Table, p. 736.)

In his acceptance speech, Carter alluded to the convention's divisions. He led off with praise for Kennedy's tough campaign, thanks for his concessions during the convention, and an appeal for future help. "Ted, your party needs—and I need—you, and your idealism and dedication working for us." Carter spent much of the speech characterizing Reagan's programs as a disastrous "fantasy world" of easy answers. He avoided detailed comments on the economic issues over which he and Kennedy had split, confining himself to statements that he wanted jobs for all who needed them.

As expected, Mondale was renominated for vice president. The vice president's acceptance speech set delegates chanting "Not Ronald Reagan" as Mondale reeled off a list of liberal values and programs that, he said, most Americans agreed with. Mondale was one of the few speakers to unequivocally praise Carter's record, which he did at some length. The speech ended with a warning not to "let anyone make us less than what we can be."

Following are excerpts from the Democratic Party platform of 1980:

Employment. We specifically reaffirm our commitment to achieve all the goals of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment Act within the currently prescribed dates in the Act, especially those relating to a joint reduction in unemployment and inflation. Full employment is important to the achievement of a rising standard of living, to the pursuit of sound justice, and to the strength and vitality of America.

Antirecession Assistance. A Democratic antirecession program must recognize that Blacks, Hispanics, other minorities, women, and older workers bear the brunt of recession. We pledge a $12 billion anti-recession jobs program....

Tax Reductions. We commit ourselves to targeted tax reductions designed to stimulate production and combat recession as soon as it appears so that tax reductions will not have a disproportionately inflationary effect. We must avoid untar-geted tax cuts which would increase inflation.

Federal Spending. Spending restraint must be sensitive to those who look to the federal government for aid and assistance, especially to our nation's workers in times of high unemployment. At the same time, as long as inflationary pressures remain strong, fiscal prudence is essential to avoid destroying the progress made to date in reducing the inflation rate.

Fiscal policy must remain a flexible economic tool. We oppose a Constitutional amendment requiring a balanced budget.

Interest Rates. ... [W]e must continue to pursue a tough anti-inflationary policy which will lead to an across-the-board reduction in interest rates on loans.

In using monetary policy to fight inflation, the government should be sensitive to the special needs of areas of our economy most affected by high interest rates.

Worker Protection. The Democratic Party will not pursue a policy of high interest rates and unemployment as the means to fight inflation. We will take no action whose effect will be a significant increase in unemployment, no fiscal action, no monetary action, no budgetary action. The Democratic Party remains committed to policies that will not produce high interest rates or high unemployment.

OSHA protections should be properly administered, with the concern of the worker being the highest priority; legislative or administrative efforts to weaken OSHA's basic worker protection responsibilities are unacceptable.

We will continue to oppose a sub-minimum wage for youth and other workers and to support increases in the minimum wage so as to ensure an adequate income for all workers.

Human Needs. While we recognize the need for fiscal restraint ... we pledge as Democrats that for the sole and primary purpose of fiscal restraint alone, we will not support reductions in the funding of any program whose purpose is to serve the basic human needs of the most needy in our society—programs such as unemployment, income maintenance, food stamps, and efforts to enhance the educational, nutritional or health needs of children.

Education. ... [W]e will continue to support the Department of Education and assist in its all-important educational enterprise....

Equal Rights Amendment. ... [T]he Democratic Party must ensure that ERA at last becomes the 27 Amendment to the Constitution. We oppose efforts to rescind ERA in states which have already ratified the amendment, and we shall insist that past rescissions are invalid.

Abortion. The Democratic Party recognizes reproductive freedom as a fundamental human right. We therefore oppose government interference in the reproductive decisions of Americans, especially those government programs or legislative restrictions that deny poor Americans their right to privacy by funding or advocating one or a limited number of reproductive choices only. Specifically, the Democratic Party opposes ... restrictions on funding for health services for the poor that deny poor women especially the right to exercise a constitutionally-guaranteed right to privacy.

Gun Control. The Democratic Party affirms the right of sportsmen to possess guns for purely hunting and target-shooting purposes. However, handguns simplify and intensify violent crime.... The Democratic Party supports enactment of federal legislation to strengthen the presently inadequate regulations over the manufacture, assembly, distribution, and possession of handguns and to ban “Saturday night specials.”

Energy. We must make energy conservation our highest priority, not only to reduce our dependence on foreign oil, but also to guarantee that our children and grandchildren have an adequate supply of energy....

National Security. Our fourth major objective is to strengthen the military security of the United States and our Allies at a time when trends in the military balance have become increasingly adverse. America is now, and will continue to be, the strongest power on earth. It was the Democratic Party’s greatest hope that we could, in fact, reduce our military effort. But realities of the world situation, including the unremitting buildup of Soviet military forces, required that we begin early to reverse the decade-long decline in American defense efforts.

National Unity Campaign

Rep. John B. Anderson of Illinois, a moderate Republican, declared himself an independent candidate for the presidency April 24, 1980, after it became clear that he could not obtain his party’s presidential nomination. Anderson created the National Unity Campaign as the vehicle for his third-party candidacy. No party convention was held to select Anderson or to ratify the selection.

On August 25 Anderson announced he had tapped former Wisconsin governor Patrick J. Lucey, a Democrat, to be his running mate. The selection of Lucey was seen as a move by Anderson to attract liberal Democrats disgruntled by President Jimmy Carter’s renomination. Anderson’s choice of a running mate and the August 30 release of a National Unity Campaign platform helped establish him as a genuine contender in the presidential race.

The 317-page platform put forth specific proposals on a variety of national issues, emphasizing domestic questions. The positions taken generally were fiscally conservative and socially liberal, remaining true to Anderson’s “wallet on the right, heart on the left” philosophy.

The platform made clear that Anderson’s primary goal was to restore the nation’s economic health by adopting fiscal and tax policies that would “generate a substantial pool of investment capital,” which then would be used to increase productivity and create jobs. Anderson proposed countercyclical revenue sharing to direct federal funds to areas hardest hit by the election year recession. He rejected mandatory wage and price controls as a cure for inflation, proposing instead a program under which the government would encourage labor and management to work toward agreement on proper levels for wages and prices and use tax incentives to encourage compliance with the standards set. In contrast to both Carter and Reagan, Anderson opposed tax cuts for individuals. He also criticized constitutional amendments to balance the federal budget, saying that while the budget should be balanced “in ordinary times,” it could be expected to run a deficit in times of “economic difficulty.”

Anderson’s energy policy made reducing oil imports the top priority. His platform proposed a 50-cent-a-gallon excise tax on gasoline to discourage consumption, with the revenue to be used to cut Social Security taxes. Anderson favored the decontrol of oil prices begun under Carter and proposed a 40-mile-per-gallon fuel economy standard for new autos.

For U.S. cities, Anderson proposed using about 90 percent of alcohol and tobacco taxes to help build mass transit systems and fight deterioration of public facilities. He also favored offering tax incentives to encourage businesses to locate in blighted urban areas.

Following are excerpts from the National Unity Campaign platform of 1980:

Economy. We will construct a Wage-Price Incentives Program. Our administration will invite labor and management leaders to agree upon fair and realistic guidelines and to determine appropriate tax-based incentives to encourage compliance....

In the absence of sharp and prolonged increases in the rate of inflation, we will oppose mandatory wage and price standards.

Gasoline Tax. We would couple decontrol of oil and gas prices with an excise tax of 50 cents per gallon on gasoline, the full revenues of that tax being returned to individuals through reductions in payroll taxes and increased Social Security benefits.... We will employ tax credits and other incentives to promote substitution of nonpetroleum energy for oil, adoption of energy-efficient systems in industry and elsewhere, improvements in transportation and energy production technologies, and development of less wasteful structures for home and commerce.

Cities. ... [A]n Anderson-Lucey Administration will propose an Urban Reinvestment Trust Fund. Funded through ... revenues from the Federal alcohol and tobacco excise taxes and phased in over three years, it will disburse approximately $3.9 billion annually. It will be used for upgrading, repair and replacement of [urban] capital plant and equipment.

Within our distressed older cities, there are zones of devastation, blighted by crime, arson and population flight.... We favor legislation that would create “enterprise zones” in these areas, by lowering corporate, capital gains, payroll and property taxes and by furnishing new tax incentives....

Social Issues. We are committed to ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment. We oppose government intrusion in the most intimate of family decisions—the right to bear or not to bear children—and will fight against any constitutional amendment prohibiting abortion. We support public funding of family planning services and other efforts to enable women to find ... alternatives to abortion.

National Defense and Arms Control. In strategic forces, we will maintain a stable balance by preserving essential equivalence with the Soviet Union. To meet an evolving threat to our deterrent, we will modernize and diversify our strategic arsenal.

The growing concern over the threat to fixed, land-based missiles poses an urgent problem to both the United States and the Soviet Union. Economically, environmentally and strategically, the ... cure proposed by the Carter Administration—the MX system—is unsound....

We favor ... a short-term ... nuclear test ban treaty between the United States, the Soviet Union and the United Kingdom....

For a more effective defense, we will rely heavily on collective security arrangements with our principal allies in NATO and Japan. We will work to reinforce and enhance our historic partnership with our Western European allies.

We will propose to Moscow supplementary measures that could make possible the ratification of the SALT II Treaty and the start of SALT III negotiations. These proposals will respond to concerns expressed in the U.S. Senate regarding such issues as verification and future force reductions.

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Democrats

Ending a long and difficult nomination campaign with a display of party unity and a historic vice-presidential choice, Walter F. Mondale used the 1984 Democratic convention to sound the opening themes of his challenge to President Ronald Reagan: family, fairness, the flag, and the future.

Accepting their nominations July 19 before cheering, flag-waving delegates at the San Francisco convention, the presidential candidate and his running mate, Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro of New York, served notice that they would hold Reagan to account for his policies in their uphill battle to capture the White House. “Here is the truth about the [nation’s] future,” Mondale told the Democrats as they wrapped up their four-day convention. “We are living on borrowed money and borrowed time.”

The spectacle of Mondale and Ferraro, with their families, celebrating with delegates in the jammed Moscone Center capped a week in which the Democrats came together to choose their ticket and shore up party unity. Toward that end, the convention succeeded to a greater degree than had seemed possible when the former vice president was battling Sen. Gary Hart of Colorado and Jesse L. Jackson in the primaries and caucuses. There was little acrimony over consideration of the party platform; and once Mondale was nominated, the three rivals seemed to put aside their most visible differences.

The fifty-six-year-old Minnesotan had been the apparent winner since the final round of primaries on June 5, when he took New Jersey, which gave him the 1,967 pledged delegates needed to take the nomination. Mondale finished the convention balloting with nearly a thousand votes more than Hart, his closest competitor, yet he was by no means an overwhelming choice. He polled 2,191 votes—about 56 percent of a possible 3,933. Jackson received 465.5 votes. (Table, p. 739.)

The Democratic unity displayed in San Francisco—so different from the 1980 convention, when the struggle between President Jimmy Carter and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts left the party torn and battered—was largely because of delegates’ deeply felt antipathy to the policies of the Reagan administration. The unusual harmony, at least in part, was also because of Gov. Mario M. Cuomo of New York, who electrified delegates with his keynote address on the opening night, July 16. In an eloquent appeal for family values and compassion for the poor, he set the tone for the rest of the convention. His speech was rivaled in intensity only by Ferraro’s nomination by acclamation July 19 and an impassioned speech given by Jackson on July 17.

Speaking forcefully but without dramatic oratorical flourishes, and repeatedly interrupted by emotional applause, Cuomo combined an appeal to Democratic traditions with specific attacks on the domestic and foreign policies of the Reagan administration. Noting Reagan's reference to America as "a shining city on a hill," Cuomo said that "the hard truth is that not everyone is sharing in this city's splendor and glory. There is despair, Mr. President, in the faces that you don't see, in the places that you don't visit in your shining city."

Pledging a government of "new realism" that would combine strong but conciliatory foreign policies with tough economic initiatives, Mondale vowed in his acceptance speech to squeeze the budget and raise taxes to reduce soaring deficits, then approaching $200 billion a year. "Let's tell the truth.... Mr. Reagan will raise taxes, and so will I," Mondale said. "He won't tell you. I just did."

To Ferraro, the first woman put on the national ticket by a major party, her nomination by acclamation was a special honor. Quoting the late Rev. Martin Luther King Jr., she said that "'Occasionally in life there are moments which cannot be completely explained in words. Their meaning can only be articulated by the inaudible language of the heart.' Tonight is such a moment for me. My heart is filled with pride."

The 45,000-word platform adopted at the convention created few divisions in the party, but not many candidates were enthusiastic about using it in their fall campaigns. Adopted in an emphatic but seldom angry four-hour debate July 17, the platform drew heavily from Mondale's campaign themes. It also contained significant contributions from Hart and Jackson.

The debate on five minority planks offered by Hart and Jackson was lackluster compared with the heated platform struggles between Carter and Kennedy at the 1980 convention. The first sign that Mondale would surmount the Jackson challenges came on the plank pledging "no first use" of nuclear weapons. After a brief debate, it was defeated, with 1,405.7 delegates voting for it and 2,216.3 against. (Table, p. 738.)

Jackson supporters said it was "morally and militarily insane" even to consider using nuclear weapons, but Mondale's backers said the platform's arms control language was strong enough in promising movement toward a "no-first-use" stance.

In contrast to the opposition to Jackson's national security planks, Hart's "peace plank" was readily accepted by Mondale. Delegates adopted it, 3,271.8 to 351.2. The plank said a Democratic president would not "hazard American lives or engage in unilateral military involvement" in areas such as the Persian Gulf or Central America unless American objectives were clear and diplomatic efforts had been exhausted. (Table, p. 738.) runoff primaries in the South and affirmative action. His call to abolish runoff primaries was defeated, but a compromise version of the affirmative action plank was accepted.

Jackson's two other minority reports dealt with issues of special interest to his African American constituency:

Ten southern states used runoff primaries when no candidate received a majority in the first primary. Jackson claimed these second elections diluted minority voting strength because white voters often reverted to racial loyalty when a runoff choice was between a white and a black candidate. Supporters of second primaries argued that they prevented the nomination of fringe candidates who could receive a plurality in first-round primaries when more credible candidates split the vote. The dual primaries plank was defeated 2,500.8 to 1,253.2. (Table, p. 738.)

The other dispute was whether the platform should reject the use of quotas to overturn discrimination in employment and education. As adopted in June, the platform specifically rejected quotas but called for affirmative action goals and timetables to end discrimination in hiring, promotions, and education.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1984:

Budget Deficits. ... The Democratic Party is pledged to reducing these intolerable deficits. We will reassess defense expenditures; create a tax system that is both adequate and fair; control skyrocketing health costs without sacrificing quality of care; and eliminate other unnecessary expenditures.

We oppose the artificial and rigid Constitutional restraint of a balanced budget amendment. Further we oppose efforts to call a federal constitutional convention for this purpose.

Tax Reform. We will cap the effect of the Reagan tax cuts for wealthy Americans and enhance the progressivity of our personal income tax code, limiting the benefits of the third year of the Reagan tax cuts to the level of those with incomes of less than $60,000. We will partially defer indexation while protecting average Americans. We will close loopholes, eliminate the preferences and write-offs, exemptions, and deductions which skew the code toward the rich and toward unproductive tax shelters. Given the fact that there has been a veritable hemorrhage of capital out of the federal budget, reflected in part by the huge budget deficit, there must be a return to a fair tax on corporate income....

Controlling Domestic Spending. Social Security is one of the most important and successful initiatives in the history of our country, and it is an essential element of the social compact that binds us together as a community. There is no excuse—as the Reagan Administration has repeatedly suggested—for slashing Social Security to pay for excesses in other areas of the budget. We will steadfastly oppose such efforts, now and in the future.

It is rather in the area of health care costs that reform is urgently needed. By 1988, Medicare costs will rise to $106 billion; by the turn of the century, the debt of the trust fund may be as great as $1 trillion. In the Republican view, the problem is the level of benefits which senior citizens and the needy receive. As Democrats, we will protect the interests of health care beneficiaries. The real problem is the growing cost of health care services....

Affirmative Action. The Democratic Party firmly commits itself to protect the civil rights of every citizen and to pursue justice and equal treatment under the law for all citizens. The Party reaffirms its longstanding commitment to the eradication of discrimination in all aspects of American life through the use of affirmative action goals, timetables, and other verifiable measurements to overturn historic patterns and historic burdens of discrimination in hiring, training, promotions, contract procurement, education, and the administration of all Federal programs....

Equal Rights for Women. A top priority of a Democratic Administration will be ratification of the unamended Equal Rights Amendment.... The Democratic Party defines nondiscrimination to encompass both equal pay for equal work and equal pay for work of comparable worth, and we pledge to take every step, including enforcement of current law and amending the Constitution to include the unamended ERA, to close the wage gap.

Abortion. ... The Democratic Party recognizes reproductive freedom as a fundamental human right. We therefore oppose government interference in the reproductive decisions of Americans, especially government interference which denies poor Americans their right to privacy by funding or advocating one or a limited number of reproductive choices only....

Voting Rights Act. A Democratic President and Administration pledge to eliminate any and all discriminatory barriers to full voting rights, whether they be at-large requirements, second-primaries, gerrymandering, annexation, dual registration, dual voting or other practices. Whatever law, practice, or regulation discriminates against the voting rights of minority citizens, a Democratic President and Administration will move to strike it down....

Homosexual Rights. ... All groups must be protected from discrimination based on race, color, sex, religion, national origin, language, age, or sexual orientation. We will support legislation to prohibit discrimination in the workplace based on sexual orientation. We will assure that sexual orientation per se does not serve as a bar to participation in the military....

Gun Control. We support tough restraints on the manufacture, transportation, and sale of snubnosed handguns, which have no legitimate sporting use and are used in a high proportion of violent crimes.

Arms Control. ... A Democratic President will propose an early summit with regular, annual summits to follow, with the Soviet leaders, and meetings between senior civilian and military officials, in order to reduce tensions and explore possible formal agreements.... Our ultimate aim must be to abolish all nuclear weapons in a world safe for peace and freedom....

These steps should lead promptly to the negotiation of a comprehensive, mutual and verifiable freeze on the testing, production, and deployment of all nuclear weapons. Building on this initiative, the Democratic President will update and resubmit the SALT II Treaty to the Senate for its advice and consent....

Defense Policy. The Reagan Administration measures military might by dollars spent. The Democratic Party seeks prudent defense based on sound planning and a realistic assessment of threats....

A Democratic President will be prepared to apply military force when vital American interests are threatened, particularly in the event of an attack upon the United States or its immediate allies. But he or she will not hazard American lives or engage in unilateral military involvement:

- Where our objectives are not clear;
- Until all instruments of diplomacy and non-military leverage, as appropriate, have been exhausted;
- Where our objectives threaten unacceptable costs or unreasonable levels of military force;
- Where the local forces supported are not working to resolve the causes of conflict;
- Where multilateral or allied options for the resolution of conflict are available....

The Middle East. ... The Democratic Party opposes any consideration of negotiations with the PLO, unless the PLO abandons terrorism, recognizes the state of Israel, and adheres to U.N. Resolutions 242 and 338.

Jerusalem should remain forever undivided with free access to the holy places for people of all faiths. As stated in the 1976 and 1980 platforms, the Democratic Party recognizes and supports the established status of Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. As a symbol of this stand, the U.S. Embassy should be moved from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

Central America. ... We must terminate our support for the contras and other paramilitary groups fighting in Nicaragua. We must halt those U.S. military exercises in the region which are being conducted for no other real purpose than to intimidate or provoke the Nicaraguan government or which may be used as a pretext for deeper U.S. military involvement in the area.

Republicans

A jubilant Republican Party wound up its August 20–23 convention in Dallas, Texas, confident that President Ronald Reagan and Vice President George H.W. Bush would be the winning team in November. With the ticket's renomination certain beforehand, the convention was more a celebration than a business meeting of GOP activists. Behind the cheering and display of party unity, however, ran a current of dissent: moderates, who were greatly outnumbered, voiced unhappiness with the party's direction and its platform.

During convention week, speaker after speaker criticized the Democrats, saying they represented a legacy of "malaise" from Jimmy Carter's administration and promised only a future of fear. Reagan, too, emphasized that theme in his fifty-five-minute acceptance speech. To repeated interruptions of applause and cheers, he drew sharp differences between Republicans and Democrats and between himself and the Democratic presidential nominee, Walter F. Mondale. "The choices this year are not just between two different personalities or between two political parties," Reagan said. "They are between two different visions of the future, two fundamentally different ways of governing—their government of pessimism, fear and limits ... or ours of hope, confidence and growth."

In his acceptance speech, Bush vigorously touted the Reagan administration's record. "Under this president, more lands have been acquired for parks, more for wilderness," he said. “The quality of life is better—and that’s a fact.” In foreign affairs, Bush said, “... there is new confidence in the U.S. leadership around the world.... Because our president stood firm in defense of freedom, America has regained respect throughout the world....”

Speakers in previous sessions had sought to make the same points. They tried to link former vice president Mondale to the policies and problems of the administration in which he had served. “Carter-Mondale” became their shorthand for a list of evils: inflation, high interest rates, foreign policy failures, and sagging national spirit.

GOP leaders also were eager to portray the Democratic ticket and the party’s leadership as out of step with most Democrats. They gave the spotlight to Democrats-turned-Republicans and issued one of their warmest welcomes to Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, the U.S. representative to the United Nations, whom one party leader referred to as an “enlightened Democrat.” Kirkpatrick delivered a foreign policy speech during the opening session.

Yet the convention was clearly a Republican event, with the administration firmly in control and many of its members on hand. The party’s leaders also made clear they were making a pitch for women voters, in response to the candidacy of Rep. Geraldine A. Ferraro of New York as Mondale’s running mate.

The delegates moved to renominate Reagan and Bush. Although the outcome came as no surprise, there was an unusual joint roll call on the nominations, with Reagan receiving 2,233 votes and Bush, 2,235. (Table, p. 737.)

Earlier, after spirited debate, the 106-member platform committee adopted a 1984 campaign document that conformed in virtually all respects to the themes Reagan had sounded during his first term in office. The convention itself ratified the 30,000-word platform with no debate August 21. On almost every aspect of public policy, the document stood in stark contrast to the platform the Democrats had adopted in San Francisco.

However, in its strong stand against tax increases and its criticism of the independent Federal Reserve Board, the Republican platform went further than the White House wanted. Administration representatives led by former transportation secretary Drew Lewis sought to soften the tax plank, but, while they succeeded in modifying some of the language, they were unable to alter it substantially. The tax section of the Republican platform pledged that the party would continue efforts to lower tax rates and would support tax reform that “will lead to a fair and simple tax system.” The platform said the party believed that a “modified flat tax—with specific exemptions for such items as mortgage interest—is a most promising approach.”

Taxes had mushroomed as an election issue when Mondale said in his acceptance speech at the Democratic National Convention that, regardless of who won in November, tax increases would be necessary in 1985 to combat record federal budget deficits. Mondale also accused Reagan of having a secret plan to raise taxes.

Despite an hour-long debate, the GOP platform committee had refused to endorse the proposed Equal Rights Amendment (ERA)—which Reagan opposed—or compromise language stating that the Republicans respected those who supported the amendment. The committee also turned aside challenges by party moderates to language endorsing voluntary prayer in public schools and opposing federal financing for abortions under any circumstances.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1984:

Economic Policy. Our most important economic goal is to expand and continue the economic recovery and move the nation to full employment without inflation. We therefore oppose any attempts to increase taxes, which would harm the recovery and reverse the trend to restoring control of the economy to individual Americans. We favor reducing deficits by continuing and expanding the strong economic recovery brought about by the policies of this Administration and by eliminating wasteful and unnecessary government spending....

Tax Policy. The Republican Party pledges to continue our efforts to lower tax rates, change and modernize the tax system, and eliminate the incentive-destroying effects of graduated tax rates. We therefore support tax reform that will lead to a fair and simple tax system and believe a modified flat tax—with specific exemptions for such items as mortgage interest—is a most promising approach.

Balancing the Budget. The congressional budget process is bankrupt. Its implementation has not brought spending under control, and it must be thoroughly reformed. We will work for the constitutional amendment requiring a balanced federal budget passed by the Republican Senate but blocked by the Democrat-controlled House and denounced by the Democrat Platform. If Congress fails to act on this issue, a constitutional convention should be convened to address only this issue in order to bring deficit spending under control.

The President is denied proper control over the federal budget. To remedy this, we support enhanced authority to prevent wasteful spending, including a line-item veto....

Monetary Policy. Just as our tax policy has only laid the groundwork for a new era of prosperity, reducing inflation is only the first step in restoring a stable currency. A dollar now should be worth a dollar in the future. This allows real economic growth without inflation and is the primary goal of our monetary policy.

The Federal Reserve Board’s destabilizing actions must therefore stop. We need coordination between fiscal and monetary policy, timely information about Fed decisions, and an end to the uncertainties people face in obtaining money and credit. The Gold Standard may be a useful mechanism for realizing the Federal Reserve’s determination to adopt monetary policies needed to sustain price stability.

Energy. We will complete America’s energy agenda. Natural gas should be responsibly decontrolled as rapidly as possible so that families and businesses can enjoy the full benefits of lower prices and greater production, as with decontrolled oil. We are committed to the repeal of the confiscatory windfall profits tax, which has forced the American consumer to pay more for less and left us vulnerable to the energy and economic stranglehold of foreign producers....

We are committed to the termination of the Department of Energy....

Education. We believe that education is a local function, a State responsibility, and a federal concern. The federal role in education should be limited. It includes helping parents and local authorities ensure high standards, protecting civil rights, and ensuring family rights....

We have enacted legislation to guarantee equal access to school facilities by student religious groups. Mindful of our religious diversity, we reaffirm our commitment to the freedoms of religion and speech guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and firmly support the rights of students to openly practice the same, including the right to engage in voluntary prayer in schools....

Crime and Gun Control. ... Republicans will continue to defend the constitutional right to keep and bear arms. When this right is abused and armed felonies are committed, we believe in stiff, mandatory sentencing....

Abortion. The unborn child has a fundamental individual right to life which cannot be infringed. We therefore reaffirm our support for a human life amendment to the Constitution, and we endorse legislation to make clear that the Fourteenth Amendment's protections apply to unborn children. We oppose the use of public revenues for abortion and will eliminate funding for organizations which advocate or support abortions....

We applaud President Reagan's fine record of judicial appointments, and we reaffirm our support for the appointment of judges at all levels of the judiciary who respect traditional family values and the sanctity of innocent human life....

Central America. Today, democracy is under assault throughout [Central America]. Marxist Nicaragua threatens not only Costa Rica and Honduras, but also El Salvador and Guatemala. The Sandinista regime is building the largest military force in Central America, importing Soviet equipment, Eastern bloc and PLO advisers, and thousands of Cuban mercenaries. The Sandinista government has been increasingly brazen in its embrace of Marxism-Leninism. The Sandinistas have systematically persecuted free institutions, including synagogue and church, schools, the private sector, the free press, minorities, and families and tribes throughout Nicaragua. We support continued assistance to the democratic freedom fighters in Nicaragua. Nicaragua cannot be allowed to remain a Communist sanctuary, exporting terror and arms throughout the region....

The Soviet Union. Stable and peaceful relations with the Soviet Union are possible and desirable, but they depend upon the credibility of American strength and determination.... Our policy of peace through strength encourages freedom-loving people everywhere and provides hope for those who look forward one day to enjoying the fruits of self-government....

Democrats

After years of internal warfare, the Democrats staged a remarkable show of unity at their 1988 national convention, held July 18–21 in Atlanta, Ga. For once, the issue-oriented activists who dominated the Democratic nominating process for nearly two decades subordinated their agendas to the goal of party victory, avoiding the self-inflicted wounds that had marred so many conventions since the 1968 Chicago debacle.

Massachusetts governor Michael S. Dukakis arrived at the convention with enough delegate support to ensure his nomination as the Democratic presidential candidate. Earlier, on July 12, he had announced his choice of running mate, Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas.

The only risk of serious political conflict at the convention came from Jesse L. Jackson, who finished second in the delegate race. The convention approached with some of Jackson's hard-core supporters threatening boycotts, protest marches, and walkouts. Some saw Dukakis's selection of Bentsen as a snub to Jackson. A breakthrough, however, came at a three-hour morning meeting July 18 of Dukakis, Jackson, and Bentsen. Afterward, Jackson said he was committed to helping elect the ticket, although he would still allow his name to be placed in nomination. In answer to a reporter's question, he said he no longer sought the vice presidency.

With the Dukakis-Jackson agreement reached, the atmosphere inside Atlanta's Omni Coliseum on opening night was remarkably fraternal. Democratic National Committee Chairman Paul G. Kirk Jr. persistently underlined the theme of unity, pointing to the fact that the credentials and rules reports—sources of numerous battles and test votes at past conventions—had been previously ratified by the Dukakis and Jackson campaigns. Both were adopted without discussion. Texas state treasurer Ann Richards delivered a folksy keynote address that attacked the Republican nominee, George H.W. Bush, and included one of the more memorable quips in convention oratory. "Poor George," she said. "He can't help it. He was born with a silver foot in his mouth."

In the afternoon of the second day of the convention, the candidates' campaigns eliminated their last major grounds for argument—the minority planks of the Democratic platform—with a minimum of rancor.

In the debate on what the Jackson campaign called the "fair tax" plank, Manhattan Borough president David Dinkins said that "the rich and the corporations" received the bulk of the Reagan administration tax cuts, which he blamed for the large federal deficits. But Denver mayor Federico Peña warned that passage of the plank would be campaign fodder for Republicans, who persistently portrayed the Democrats as the "tax-and-spend" party. Delegates defeated it 1,091.5 to 2,499. (Table, p. 740.)

More emotion was expressed over the nuclear-strategy plank, with Jackson supporters waving placards and chanting, "No first use!" Supporters said the plank would show Democratic commitment to world peace. But Dukakis supporters, while expressing solidarity with the cause of nuclear disarmament, said the defense strategy that called for use of nuclear weapons in the event of an invasion of western Europe was a bedrock of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) alliance. They also said that, should Dukakis be elected president, the plank could deprive him of an effective tool to force the Soviets to the bargaining table. The minority plank was defeated, 1,220.59 to 2,474.13. (Table, p. 740.)

Without debate the delegates adopted a compromise package of nine other amendments pressed by the Jackson camp and accepted by Dukakis. These embodied much of the spirit and some of the specifics that Jackson had tried to insert into the platform all along—a denunciation of aid to "irregular" forces in Central America, a national health program, sharply higher spending for education, and a moratorium on missile flight testing.

Notwithstanding the concessions to Jackson, the platform drafted by the Dukakis forces remained a general statement of party themes, rather than a series of promises to constituency groups. At 4,500 words, the platform was one-tenth the length of its 1984 counterpart.

Rousing speeches by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and Jackson topped the evening schedule. Kennedy, introduced by his nephew John F. Kennedy Jr., accused Bush of "burying his head in his hands and hiding from the record of Reagan-Bush mistakes." Kennedy then listed a series of issues—Iran-contra, the Noriega drug connection, domestic budget cuts, civil rights—on which he said the Reagan administration had made wrong choices, following each example with the refrain, "Where was George?" The delegates spontaneously picked up the slogan as a chant.

In his fifty-five-minute speech, Jackson invoked the heroes of the civil rights movement, including Martin Luther King Jr., and briefly shared the stage with Rosa Parks, heroine of the 1955 Montgomery, Alabama, bus boycott. He said that his campaign was a historic culmination of earlier black struggles. The climax of the speech was Jackson's call for Americans to "never surrender" to poverty, drugs, malnutrition, inequality, disease, or physical handicaps. "Keep hope alive," he concluded. "Keep hope alive."

Arkansas governor Bill Clinton nominated Dukakis the evening of July 20 with a thirty-five-minute speech that will be remembered more for its duration than its content. Clinton praised Dukakis as "a man with vision, a shining vision for this country."

The roll call went as predetermined by the primary-and-caucus process. The one surprise came from Minnesota, where three antiabortion delegates registered support for Rep. Richard H. Stallings of Idaho, who shared their opposition to abortion. Four other candidates received one or two votes each.

The only apparent suspense was which state would put Dukakis over the 2,082-vote total he needed to clinch the nomination. But the Dukakis campaign—cognizant of California's importance in November—had even taken care of that detail. They arranged for several delegations to pass on the first call to ensure that California would have the honor. The final tally was Dukakis 2,876.25 delegate votes; Jackson, 1,218.5. (Table, p. 740.)

For his acceptance speech on the final night of the convention, Dukakis was introduced by his cousin, Olympia Dukakis, an Oscar-winning actress and New Jersey delegate. Dukakis described himself as a product of the American dream. He paid tribute to his immigrant parents, and tears welled in his eyes when he talked about how proud his father would have been of his son, and of his adopted country. He cited individuals who represented America's cultural diversity, including Jackson.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1988:

Economy. ... We believe that all Americans have a fundamental right to economic justice in a stronger, surer national economy, an economy that must grow steadily without inflation, that can generate a rising standard of living for all and fulfill the desire of all to work in dignity up to their full potential in good health with good jobs at good wages, an economy that is prosperous in every region, from coast to coast, including our rural towns and our older industrial communities, our mining towns, our energy producing areas and the urban areas that have been neglected for the past seven years.

Education. ... [T]he education of our citizens, from Head Start to institutions of higher learning, deserves our highest priority.... We pledge to better balance our national priorities by significantly increasing federal funding for education....

Drugs. ... [I]llegal drugs pose a direct threat to the security of our nation from coast to coast.... [E]very arm and agency of government at every federal, state and local level—including every useful diplomatic, military, educational, medical and law enforcement effort necessary—should at long last be mobilized and coordinated with private efforts under the direction of a National Drug “Czar” to halt both the international supply and the domestic demand for illegal drugs now ravaging our country; and that the legalization of illicit drugs would represent a tragic surrender in a war we intend to win....

Criminal Justice. ... [T]he federal government should provide increased assistance to local criminal justice agencies, enforce a ban on “cop killer” bullets that have no purpose other than the killing and maiming of law enforcement officers, reinforce our commitment to help crime victims, and assume a leadership role in securing the safety of our neighborhoods and homes.

Individual Rights. ... [W]e must work for the adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution; that the fundamental right of reproductive choice should be guaranteed regardless of ability to pay; that our machinery for civil rights enforcement and legal services to the poor should be rebuilt and vigorously utilized; and that our immigration policy should be reformed to promote fairness, non-discrimination and family reunification and to reflect our constitutional freedoms of speech, association and travel. We further believe that the voting rights of all minorities should be protected, the recent surge in hate violence and negative stereotyping combated, the discriminatory English-only pressure groups resisted, our treaty commitments with Native Americans enforced by culturally sensitive officials, and the lingering effects of past discrimination eliminated by affirmative action, including goals, timetables, and procurement set-asides.

Health Care. ... We believe that all Americans should enjoy access to affordable, comprehensive health services for both the physically and mentally ill, from prenatal care for pregnant women at risk to more adequate care for our Vietnam and other veterans, from well-baby care to childhood immunization to Medicare; that a national health program providing federal coordination and leadership is necessary to restrain health care costs while assuring quality care and advanced medical research; that quality, affordable, long-term home and health care should be available to all senior and disabled citizens, allowing them to live with dignity in the most appropriate setting; that an important first step toward comprehensive health services is to ensure that every family should have the security of basic health insurance; and that the HIV/AIDS epidemic is an unprecedented public health emergency requiring increased support for accelerated research on, and expedited FDA approval of, treatments and vaccines....

Voting Rights. ... [T]his country’s democratic processes must be revitalized: by securing universal, same day and mail-in voter registration as well as registration on the premises of appropriate government agencies; by preventing the misuse of at-large elections, the abuse of election day challenges and registration roll purges, any undercounting in the national census, and any dilution of the one-person, one-vote principle; by ending discrimination against public employees who are denied the right to full political participation; by supporting statehood for the District of Columbia....

Defense. We believe that our national strength has been sapped by a defense establishment wasting money on duplicative and dubious new weapons instead of investing more in readiness and mobility; that our national strength will be enhanced by more stable defense budgets and by a commitment from our allies to assume a greater share of the costs and responsibilities required to maintain peace and liberty....

Arms Control. We believe in following up the INF [intermediate-range nuclear force] Treaty, a commendable first step, with mutual, verifiable and enforceable agreements that will make significant reductions in strategic weapons in a way that diminishes the risk of nuclear attack by either superpower; reduce conventional forces to lower and equivalent levels in Europe, requiring deeper cuts on the Warsaw Pact side; ban chemical and space weapons in their entirety; promptly initiate a mutual moratorium on missile flight testing and halt all nuclear weapons testing while strengthening our efforts to prevent the spread of these weapons to other nations before the nightmare of nuclear terrorism engulfs us all.

International Relations. ... [W]e believe that this country, maintaining the special relationship with Israel founded upon mutually shared values and strategic interests, should provide new leadership to deliver the promise of peace and security through negotiations that has been held out to Israel and its neighbors by the Camp David Accords.... We further believe that the United States must fully support the Arias Peace Plan, which calls for an end to the fighting, national reconciliation, guarantees of justice, freedom, human rights and democracy, an end to support for irregular forces, and a commitment by the Central American governments to prevent the use of their territory to destabilize others in the region....

Republicans

On the opening day of the Republican national convention, held August 15–18 in New Orleans’s Louisiana Superdome, the delegates hailed Ronald Reagan’s valedictory, a swan song from a politician who had carried GOP conservatives to unprecedented levels of power. The delegates greeted Reagan as a conquering hero, and they cheered enthusiastically at many of his applause lines. But the mood was tempered by the poignancy of the moment—a realization that Reagan was making his last convention speech as leader of his party and his country, and that the future for Republicans was uncertain.

For his part, Reagan was firm if slightly subdued in his farewell speech. He offered again his optimistic vision of America and took some predictable jabs at his Democratic critics. But the most pertinent symbol of Reagan's role in the 1988 campaign was his strong praise of Vice President George H.W. Bush, saying, "George played a major role in everything that we have accomplished in these eight years." Reagan responded to the Democrats' "Where was George?" chant by intoning, "George was there." Reagan's promise of campaign assistance and his call for Bush to "win one for the Gipper" was a lift for Bush supporters, who had been disturbed by Reagan's previously pallid endorsement of their candidate.

The Republicans had plenty of theater scheduled for August 16, with an agenda that included New Jersey governor Thomas H. Kean's keynote address and speeches by evangelist and former GOP presidential candidate Pat Robertson, former United Nations representative Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, and former president Gerald R. Ford. But Bush himself stole the show with his midafternoon announcement that he had selected dark-horse prospect Sen. Dan Quayle of Indiana as his running mate.

Bush made the choice public at a welcoming ceremony on the New Orleans riverfront. He praised Quayle, who was a generation younger than Bush, as "a man of the future." News reporters, meanwhile, had little to distract them from their rounds on the vice-presidential rumor circuit as the reports of the credentials, rules, and platform committees were approved without debate in the morning session.

But there was no press "honeymoon" for the prospective vice-presidential nominee. A series of tough questions asked at an August 17 news conference with Bush made the afternoon difficult for Quayle—and, by extension, for Bush. The most potentially explosive issue raised was whether Quayle, a member of Indiana's Pulliam publishing family, had used family influence to gain enlistment in the Indiana National Guard in 1969 to avoid service in the Vietnam War. Quayle dismissed the question as "a cheap shot," but then said his thoughts at the time centered on plans for law school, marriage, and family. The controversy, however, did not subdue the enthusiasm of convention delegates—for their soon-to-be presidential nominee or his choice of vice president. In the evening session, after a lengthy roll call, George W. Bush announced the Texas delegation votes that put his father over the top unopposed. (Table, p. 741.)

The Indiana senator was nominated by acclamation. A new party rule had eliminated the necessity of a roll call and made it difficult for dissident delegates to call for one had there been opposition to Bush's choice.

Early on in his acceptance speech Quayle confronted the National Guard issue briefly and with a somewhat defiant tone. After expressing pride in his congressional service, he said, "As a young man, I served six years in the National Guard, and like the millions of Americans who have served in the Guard ... I am proud of it."

With Bush trailing his Democratic opponent, Michael S. Dukakis, in public opinion polls, media commentators and Bush supporters alike said he had to make the "speech of his life" in accepting the presidential nomination on the night of August 18. Bush did not waste the opportunity.

He hit on the conservative hot-button issues—the Pledge of Allegiance (Dukakis had vetoed, on constitutional grounds, a bill requiring Massachusetts public school students to recite the pledge), the death penalty, voluntary school prayer, gun ownership, opposition to abortion, prison furloughs—that had been raised by speaker after speaker during the convention.

Restating his promise not to raise taxes, which he said Dukakis would not rule out, Bush said he would tell persistent tax proponents to "Read my lips. 'No new taxes.'" Bush finished his speech by leading the convention in the Pledge of Allegiance, ending a week in which a record may have been set for mentions of the pledge.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1988:

Jobs. ... The Republican Party puts the creation of jobs and opportunity first.... We will use new technologies, such as computer data bases and telecommunications, to strengthen and streamline job banks matching people who want work with available jobs.

We advocate incentives for educating, training, and retraining workers for new and better jobs—through programs like the Job Training Partnership Act, which provides for a public/private partnership....

With its message of economic growth and opportunity, the GOP is the natural champion of blacks, minorities, women and ethnic Americans.... We are the party of real social progress. Republicans welcome the millions of forward-looking Americans who want an "opportunity society," not a welfare state....

Taxes. We oppose any attempts to increase taxes. Tax increases harm the economic expansion and reverse the trend to restoring control of the economy to individual Americans.

We reject calls for higher taxes from all quarters—including "bipartisan commissions." The decisions of our government should not be left to a body of unelected officials....

Health. Republicans believe in reduced government control of health care while maintaining an unequivocal commitment to quality health care....

AIDS. We will vigorously fight against AIDS.... Continued research on the virus is vital. We will continue as well to provide experimental drugs that may prolong life. We will establish within the Food and Drug Administration a process for expedited review of drugs which may benefit AIDS patients. We will allow supervised usage of experimental treatments.

We must not only marshal our scientific resources against AIDS, but must also protect those who do not have the disease. In this regard, education plays a critical role. AIDS education should emphasize that abstinence from drug abuse and sexual activity outside of marriage is the safest way to avoid infection with the AIDS virus....

Social Security. We pledge to preserve the integrity of the Social Security trust funds. We encourage public officials at all levels to safeguard the integrity of public and private pension funds against raiding....

Equal Rights, Religious Rights, Abortion. “Deep in our hearts, we do believe”:

- That bigotry has no place in American life. We denounce those persons, organizations, publications and movements which practice or promote racism, anti-Semitism or religious intolerance.

- That the Pledge of Allegiance should be recited daily in schools in all States....

- In defending religious freedom. Mindful of our religious diversity, we firmly support the right of students to engage in voluntary prayer in schools. We call for full enforcement of the Republican legislation that now guarantees equal access to school facilities by student religious groups.

- That the unborn child has a fundamental right to life which cannot be infringed. We therefore reaffirm our support for a human life amendment to the Constitution, and we endorse legislation to make clear that the Fourteenth Amendment’s protections apply to unborn children. We oppose the use of public revenues for abortion and will eliminate funding for organizations which advocate or support abortion....

Disabled. We support efforts to provide disabled voters full access to the polls and opportunity to participate in all aspects of the political process....

Gun Ownership. Republicans defend the constitutional right to keep and bear arms....

Workers’ Rights. We affirm the right of all freely to form, join or assist labor organizations to bargain collectively, consistent with state laws.... We renew our longstanding support for the right of states to enact “Right-to-Work” laws. To protect the political rights of every worker, we oppose the use of compulsory dues or fees for partisan purposes....

Crime. We will forge ahead with the Republican anti-crime agenda:

- Republicans oppose furloughs for those criminals convicted of first degree murder and others who are serving a life sentence without possibility of parole. We believe that victims’ rights should not be accorded less importance than those of convicted felons.

- We will re-establish the federal death penalty....

Drugs. The Republican Party is committed to a drug-free America. Our policy is strict accountability, for users of illegal drugs as well as for those who profit by that usage....

- The Republican Party unequivocally opposes legalizing or decriminalizing any illicit drug.

- We support strong penalties, including the death penalty for major drug traffickers....

Oil. We will set an energy policy for the United States to maintain a viable core industry and to ensure greater energy self sufficiency through private initiatives. We will adopt forceful initiatives to reverse the decline of our domestic oil production. Republicans support:

- Repeal of the counterproductive Windfall Profits Tax.

- Maintenance of our schedule for filling the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to reach 750 million barrels by 1993 and encouragement of our allies to maintain similar reserves....

Environment. Republicans propose the following program for the environment in the 1990s:

- We will work for further reductions in air and water pollution and effective actions against the threats posed by acid rain....

- A top priority of our country must be the continued improvement of our National Parks and wildlife areas....

The Americas. The Republican party reaffirms its strong support of the Monroe Doctrine as the foundation for our policy throughout the Hemisphere, and pledges to conduct foreign policy in accord with its principles....

Republicans will continue to oppose any normalization of relations with the government of Cuba as long as Fidel Castro continues to oppress the Cuban people at home and to support international terrorism and drug trafficking abroad. We will vigorously continue our support for establishment of a genuinely representative government directly elected by the Cuban people. We reiterate our support of Radio Marti and urge the creation of TV Marti to better reach the oppressed people of Cuba....

Soviet Union. Steady American leadership is needed now more than ever to deal with the challenges posed by a rapidly changing Soviet Union. Americans cannot afford a future administration which eagerly attempts to embrace perceived, but as yet unproven, changes in Soviet policy. Nor can we indulge naive inexperience or an overly enthusiastic endorsement of current Soviet rhetoric....

Republicans proudly reaffirm the Reagan Doctrine: America’s commitment to aid freedom-fighters against the communist oppression which destroys freedom and the human spirit....

The Middle East. The foundation of our policy in the Middle East has been and must remain the promotion of a stable and lasting peace, recognizing our moral and strategic relationship with Israel....

We will continue to maintain Israel’s qualitative advantage over any adversary or coalition of adversaries.

We will continue to solidify our strategic relationship with Israel....

We oppose the creation of an independent Palestinian state; its establishment is inimical to the security interests of Israel, Jordan and the U.S....

Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI). We are committed to rapid and certain deployment of SDI as technologies permit, and we will determine the exact architecture of the system as technologies are tested and proven....

Arms Control. Arms reduction can be an important aspect of our national policy only when agreements enhance the security of the United States and its allies. [T]rue arms reductions as a means to improve U.S. security, not just the perception of East-West détente....

- We will consistently undertake necessary improvements in our forces to maintain the effectiveness of our deterrent.

- We will not negotiate in areas which jeopardize our security. In particular, we will not compromise plans for the research, testing, or the rapid and certain deployment of SDI....

Democrats

The Democrats, meeting July 13–16 at Madison Square Garden in New York, nominated a national ticket of party moderates and adopted a 1992 platform heavily influenced by the centrist ideas of the Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) and its think tank, the Progressive Policy Institute.

The convention stressed the themes Democrats planned to push in the fall campaign: redefining the party in the centrist vein, emphasizing youth, traditional family values, and mainstream policy views—as desired by its nominee, Arkansas governor and DLC leader, Bill Clinton. Every bit as unobvious were the efforts to redefine the nominee's personal image. In appealing to youth, as in much else, Clinton, forty-five, was assisted by his running mate, Sen. Albert “Al” Gore Jr., forty-four, of Tennessee, making their ticket the youngest in the twentieth century.

Despite the refusal of former California governor Edmund G. “Jerry” Brown Jr. to hop on the bandwagon or the stunning July 16 announcement from independent presidential candidate H. Ross Perot that he was bowing out (a decision he later reversed), Clinton controlled the focus and direction of the convention. He declined to yield to the tough tactics of African American activist and former presidential candidate Jesse L. Jackson, demonstrating a tough-mindedness of his own.

The convention was marked by relatively few factional disputes. Controversy involved primarily the question of whether Gov. Jerry Brown would be allowed to address the convention from the podium. Brown arrived with more than 600 delegates, enough to cause some disturbance. For most of the first session, they milled about in the well beneath the main stage, heckling speakers and waving signs. Some covered their mouths with labels or duct tape.

In the end, Brown was allowed to give his seconding speech on July 15. But that meant he spoke at shortly after 8 p.m. (on the East Coast), well before the commercial broadcast networks had switched from their regular programming to convention coverage. Gradually, the Brown delegates softened their protest and ended any serious attempt to disrupt the convention.

A large section of the opening program was designed to give exposure to six of the Democrats' leading female Senate candidates, all of whom spoke briefly from the convention floor. Dianne Feinstein of California, the last to speak, dismissed Republicans who referred to the wave of female candidates as “just gender politics.” “It's not just about gender. It's about an agenda, an agenda of change,” Feinstein said.

Heralding the “Year of the Woman,” Democratic women played a major role at the convention, and issues women had highlighted—abortion rights, women's health care, and the Clarence Thomas–Anita F. Hill hearings—were discussed from the podium, always to loud cheers from the floor.

Instead of the usual keynote speaker, the Democrats opted for three: Sen. Bill Bradley of New Jersey, Gov. Zell Miller of Georgia, and former Texas representative Barbara Jordan. They stressed that the party had changed, blasted the Bush administration for economic policies that favored the rich, and portrayed Clinton as a candidate with modest roots who was in touch with the people.

The Democrats later solidified their move to the center by adopting a platform devoid of many of the liberal planks and slogans that characterized previous documents. The debate over the party's manifesto was brief and uninspired. Clinton's overwhelming delegate strength and Democrats' frustration with three straight presidential losses helped mute any complaints over the centrist platform that clearly reflected the Clinton view of how the Democratic Party should present itself to voters.

The platform emphasized the need for economic growth and pledged efforts to uphold law and order, use of military force overseas where necessary, a cutoff in welfare benefits after two years, and support for the right of states to enact death penalty statutes. The platform did include more traditional Democratic viewpoints, such as protecting abortion rights, providing civil rights for homosexuals, and taxing wealthy people at higher rates.

By earlier agreement, delegates pledged to former senator Paul E. Tsongas of Massachusetts were allowed to offer and debate four minority planks. Three of the planks ultimately were rejected by voice vote. One called for investment-related tax breaks. Another, on the deficit, called for limits on government spending, including Medicare and other politically sensitive entitlements. A third proposed increasing the gasoline tax by five cents per gallon to benefit new spending on roads and bridges. A roll-call vote was held on the fourth plank, which said that a middle-class tax cut and a tax credit for families with children ought to be delayed until the deficit was under control. This had been a key difference between Tsongas and Clinton during the campaign. Delegates defeated the plank, 953 to 2,287. (Table, p. 742.)

New York governor Mario M. Cuomo formally nominated Clinton, saluting him as the “comeback kid.” The final roll-call tally was Clinton, 3,372; Brown, 596; and Tsongas, 209; and subsequently, the nomination was approved by acclamation. After the vote, Clinton paid a surprise “thank you” visit to the convention, as John F. Kennedy had done in 1960.

The next day, in his fifty-four-minute acceptance speech, some twenty minutes longer than the seemingly interminable nominating speech he gave in 1988, Clinton described himself as “a product of the American middle class” who would accept the nomination “in the name of all the people who do the work, pay the taxes, raise the kids, and play by the rules....” Pledging a “government that is leaner, not meaner,” he called for “a New Covenant, based not simply on what each of us can take, but on what all of us must give to our nation.” Clinton and Gore paid respect to the intensity of women's political feeling. They endorsed abortion rights and equal rights in the workplace; both lavished praise on their wives, receiving roars of approval from the audience; and when Clinton talked of a notional child “somewhere at this very moment ... born in America,” he deliberately used female pronouns to refer to her.

Clinton often referred to himself as “the comeback kid.” He claimed the title after rebounding from loss of the New Hampshire primary (to Tsongas), damaging stories about his alleged relationship with a singer, and about the means by which he avoided the Vietnam War draft.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1992:

Economic Opportunity. Our party's first priority is opportunity—broad-based, non-inflationary economic growth and the opportunity that flows from it. Democrats in 1992 hold nothing more important for America than an economy that offers growth and jobs for all.... We reject both the do-nothing government of the last 12 years and the big government theory that says we can hamstring business and tax and spend our way to prosperity....

The Deficit. Addressing the deficit requires fair and shared sacrifice of all Americans for the common good.... In place of the Republican supply side disaster, the Democratic investment, economic conversion and growth strategy will generate more revenues from a growing economy. We must also tackle spending by putting everything on the table....

Education. A competitive American economy requires the global market's best-educated, best-trained, most flexible work force. It's not enough to spend more on our schools; we must insist on results. We oppose the Bush administration's efforts to bankrupt the public school system—the bedrock of democracy—through private school vouchers....

Health Care. All Americans should have universal access to quality, affordable health care—not as a privilege but as a right. That requires tough controls on health costs, which are rising at two to three times the rate of inflation, terrorizing American families and businesses and depriving millions of the care they need. We will enact a uniquely American reform of the health-care system.... We must be united in declaring war on AIDS and HIV disease, implement the recommendations of the National Commission on AIDS and fully fund the Ryan White Care Act; provide targeted and honest prevention campaigns; combat HIV-related discrimination; make drug treatment available for all addicts who seek it; guarantee access to quality care; expand clinical trials for treatments and vaccines; and speed up the FDA [Food and Drug Administration] drug approval process.

Energy. We reject the Republican myth that energy efficiency and environmental protection are enemies of economic growth. We will make our economy more efficient, using less energy, reducing our dependence on foreign oil, and producing less solid and toxic waste....

Civil and Equal Rights. We don't have an American to waste. Democrats will continue to lead the fight to ensure that no Americans suffer discrimination or deprivation of rights on the basis of race, gender, language, national origin, religion, age, disability, sexual orientation or other characteristics irrelevant to ability. We support ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment, affirmative action, stronger protection of voting rights for racial and ethnic minorities, including language access to voting, and continued resistance to discriminatory

English-only pressure groups.... provide civil rights protection for gay men and lesbians and an end to Defense Department discrimination; respect Native American culture and our treaty commitments;... and fully enforce the Americans with Disabilities Act to enable people with disabilities to achieve independence and function at their highest possible level.

Welfare Reform. Welfare should be a second chance, not a way of life. We want to break the cycle of welfare by adhering to two simple principles: No one who is able to work can stay on welfare forever, and no one who works should live in poverty.... We will give them the help they need to make the transition from welfare to work, and require people who can work to go to work within two years in available jobs either in the private sector or in community service to meet unmet needs. That will restore the covenant that welfare was meant to be: A promise of temporary help for people who have fallen on hard times.

Abortion. Democrats stand behind the right of every woman to choose, consistent with Roe v. Wade, regardless of ability to pay, and support a national law to protect that right....

Environment. ... We will oppose Republican efforts to gut the Clean Air Act in the guise of competitiveness. We will reduce the volume of solid waste and encourage the use of recycled materials while discouraging excess packaging. To avoid the mistakes of the past, we will actively support energy efficiency, recycling and pollution-prevention strategies.

Government Reform. Democrats in 1992 intend to lead a revolution in government, challenging it to act responsibly and be accountable, starting with the hardest and most urgent problems of the deficit and economic growth....

Crime and Drugs. To empower America's communities, Democrats pledge to restore government as upholder of basic law and order for crime-ravaged communities. The simplest and most direct way to restore order in our cities is to put more police on the streets.... We support a reasonable waiting period to permit background checks for purchases of handguns, as well as assault weapons controls to ban the possession, sale, importation and manufacture of the most deadly assault weapons....

Defense. ... The United States must be prepared to use military force decisively when necessary to defend our vital interests. The burdens of collective security in a new era must be shared fairly, and we should encourage multilateral peace-keeping through the United Nations and other international efforts.

Middle East Peace. Support for the peace process now under way in the Middle East, rooted in the tradition of the Camp David accords. Direct negotiations between Israel, her Arab neighbors and Palestinians, with no imposed solutions, are the only way to achieve enduring security for Israel and full peace for all parties in the region....

Human Rights. Standing everywhere for the rights of individuals and respect for ethnic minorities against the repressive acts of governments—against torture, political imprisonment and all attacks on civilized standards of human freedom. This is a proud tradition of the Democratic Party, which has stood for freedom in South Africa and continues to resist oppression in Cuba. Our nation should once again promote the principle of sanctuary for politically oppressed people everywhere, be they Haitian refugees, Soviet Jews seeking U.S. help in their successful absorption into Israeli society or Vietnamese fleeing communism. Forcible return of anyone fleeing political repression is a betrayal of American values.

Republicans

Five weeks after the Democratic convention, the Republicans convened in Houston August 17–20 and did their best to persuade voters to remember the past and trust in experience. From the rousing opening night performance of former president Ronald Reagan to the repeated calls to honor traditional family values, the Republican National Convention looked backward as much as it looked ahead.

There were frequent references to having defeated communism and having won the Persian Gulf War. Voters were asked to ignore the Democrats' attempt to remake themselves in a more moderate image and to remember instead what life was like under Jimmy Carter, the most recent Democratic president.

There was little moderation evident in the party platform adopted for George H.W. Bush's second term. The GOP approved a hard-line approach opposing abortion rights and any attempt to increase taxes. On the social issues front, there were planks favoring school choice, school prayer, and family unity.

Finally, the delegates needed little prompting to vent their frustrations at the "liberal media" for praising Democratic nominee Clinton, dwelling on dissension over the GOP's antiabortion stance, and overemphasizing the weak economy. Bush sought to link Clinton to the Democratic Congress, whom he blamed for the nation's problems—a refrain that would be played over and over throughout the week.

This was a homecoming of sorts for Bush. A New Englander by birth who went to Texas to work in the oil business, he retained his residency at a Houston hotel.

Party activists also sought a fresh start for Dan Quayle, widely perceived as being bumbling, gaffe-prone, and ineffective. But many conservatives still viewed the vice president as a hero, and because Quayle survived attempts to dump him from the ticket during the weeks leading up to the convention, GOP strategists looked forward to remaking his image as a thoughtful, middle-class American fighting for family values.

When the convention opened it already had become clear that efforts to force a debate on abortion had fallen short. A majority in six delegations was required to challenge the platform's call for a constitutional ban on all abortions, but abortion rights supporters said they could muster majorities in only four delegations—Maine, Massachusetts,

New Mexico, and the Virgin Islands. The reason, they said, was that delegates felt it was more important to avoid embarrassing Bush than to force an open debate. In the end the platform was approved by voice vote. There were cries of “no!” when the document was put to delegates, but no public challenge.

In his speech conservative columnist Patrick J. Buchanan, who had unsuccessfully challenged Bush in the primaries, appealed to his supporters to throw their support to the president. He acknowledged the disagreements that led him to challenge Bush but said the convention marked the time to unite.

Buchanan’s remarks were enthusiastically received in the hall, but the biggest response came for former President Reagan, who described his speech as the “last chapter” in his political career. At eighty-one, the grand patriarch of the Republican Party showed all the oratorical skills and political spirit that had made him the hero of GOP conservatives.

“We stood tall and proclaimed that communism was destined for the ash heap of history,” he said. “We never heard so much ridicule from our liberal friends. But we knew then what the liberal Democrat leaders just couldn’t figure out: The sky would not fall if America restored her strength and resolve. The sky would not fall if an American president spoke the truth. The only thing that would fall was the Berlin Wall.”

The nomination roll call was arranged so that Texas, the convention’s host state and technically Bush’s home, put him over the top. The final tally was 2,166 votes for Bush, 18 for Buchanan, and 3 for others, before the nomination was approved by acclamation. New Hampshire never cast its 23 votes. (Table, p. 743.)

In their acceptance speeches, Bush and Quayle sought to offset negative publicity against them while hurling their negativity at the Democrats. Speaking first, Quayle defiantly answered his legion of detractors. “I know my critics wish I were not standing here tonight,” he said. “They don’t like our values. They look down on our beliefs. They’re afraid of our ideas. And they know the American people stand on our side.”

Bush came out fighting against the Democratic-controlled Congress and Clinton. Responding to the concerns of delegates still angry over his broken “no-new-taxes” pledge, Bush admitted that it had been a mistake but posed a question to the electorate. “Who do you trust in this election—the candidate who has raised taxes one time and regrets it, or the other candidate who raised taxes and fees 128 times and enjoyed it every time?”

Trust was again the issue as Bush highlighted his role as commander in chief in winning the Persian Gulf War against Iraq. His success and the remaining threats to peace allowed Bush to raise questions about what his opponent would have done.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1992:

Family Values. Our greatness starts at home—literally. So Republicans believe government should strengthen families, not replace them. Today, more than ever, the traditional family is under assault. We believe our laws should reflect what makes our nation prosperous and wholesome: faith in God, hard work, service to others and limited government.... [W]e want to expand the Young Child Tax Credit to $500 per child and make it available to all families with children under the age of 10....

Education. The Republican strategy is based on sound principle. Parents have the right to choose the best school for their children. Schools should teach right from wrong. Schools should reinforce parental authority, not replace it....

[W]e support the right of students to engage in voluntary prayer in schools and the right of the community to do so at commencements or other occasions. We will strongly enforce the law guaranteeing equal access to school facilities. We also advocate recitation of the Pledge of Allegiance in schools as a reminder of the principles that sustain us as one nation under God....

AIDS. We are committed to ensure that our nation’s response to AIDS is shaped by compassion, not fear or ignorance and will oppose, as a matter of decency and honor, any discrimination against Americans who are its victims.... Above all, a cure must be found. We have committed enormous resources—$4.2 billion over the past four years for research alone, more than for any disease except cancer....

Social Security. We reaffirm our commitment to a strong Social Security system. To stop penalizing grandparents and other seniors who care for children, we pledge to continue the Republican crusade to end the earnings limitation for Social Security recipients....

Cultural Values. We oppose any legislation or law that legally recognizes same-sex marriages and allows such couples to adopt children or provide foster care....

Welfare Reform. Today’s welfare system is anti-work and anti-marriage. It taxes families to subsidize illegitimacy. It rewards unethical behavior and penalizes initiative. It cannot be merely tinkered with by Congress; it must be re-created by states and localities. Republican governors and legislators in several states have already launched dramatic reforms, especially with workfare and learnfare. Welfare can no longer be a check in the mail with no responsibility....

Individual Rights. The protection of individual rights is the foundation for opportunity and security....

We believe the unborn child has a fundamental individual right to life that cannot be infringed. We therefore reaffirm our support for a human life amendment to the Constitution, and we endorse legislation to make clear that the 14th Amendment’s protections apply to unborn children. We oppose using public revenues for abortion and will not fund organizations that advocate it....

Republicans defend the constitutional right to keep and bear arms. We call for stiff mandatory sentences for those who use firearms in a crime....

Taxes. We will oppose any effort to increase taxes.... We believe the tax increases of 1990 should ultimately be repealed.... As the deficit comes under control, we aspire to further tax rate cuts, strengthening incentives to work, save, invest and innovate. We also support President Bush's efforts to reduce federal spending and to cap the growth of non-Social Security entitlements.... We support further tax simplification....

Government Reform. We reaffirm our support for a constitutional amendment to limit the number of terms House members and senators may serve....

Congress must stop exempting itself from laws such as the minimum wage and the civil rights statutes, as well as laws that apply to the executive branch. The Independent Counsel Act is a case in point.... If that act is reauthorized, it must be extended to Congress as well. Safety and health regulations, civil rights and minimum wage laws are further examples of areas where Congress has set itself apart from the people. This practice must end....

Budget Reform. Republicans vigorously support a balanced budget, a balanced-budget constitutional amendment and a line-item veto for the president.

Republicans believe this balancing of the budget should be achieved, not by increasing taxes to match spending, but by cutting spending to current levels of revenue. We prefer a balanced-budget amendment that contains a supermajority requirement to raise taxes....

Campaign Reform. We will require congressional candidates to raise most of their funds from individuals within their home constituencies. This will limit outside special-interest money and result in less expensive campaigns, with less padding for incumbents. To the same end, we will strengthen the role of political parties to remove pressure on candidates to spend so much time soliciting funds. We will eliminate political action committees supported by corporations, unions or trade associations, and restrict the practice of bundling.

Energy. We will... [allow] access, under environmental safeguards, to the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, possibly one of the largest petroleum reserves in our country, and to selected areas of the outer continental shelf (OCS)....

Public Lands. The millions of acres that constitute this nation's public lands must continue to provide for a number of uses. We are committed to the multiple use of our public lands. We believe that recreation, forestry, ranching, mining, oil and gas exploration, and production on our public lands can be conducted in a way compatible with their conservation....

Transportation. To keep America on the move, we assert the same principle that guides us in all other sectors of the economy: consumers benefit through competition within the private sector. That is why we will complete the job of trucking deregulation. We will also abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission, finally freeing shippers and consumers from horse-and-buggy regulation....

Middle East Peace. The basis for negotiations must be U.N. Security Council Resolutions 242 and 338. Peace must come from direct negotiations.

A meaningful peace must assure Israel's security while recognizing the legitimate rights of the Palestinian people. We oppose the creation of an independent Palestinian state. Nor will we support the creation of any political entity that would jeopardize Israel's security....

Disarmament. We will banish the threat of nuclear annihilation from the face of the earth—not by savaging our military, as some Democrats might insist but by building on the historic diplomatic achievements of Presidents Bush and Reagan.

This means ensuring stable command and control of the former Soviet arsenal, complete acceptance and verified implementation of all treaty obligations by the successor states to the Soviet Union, and achieving the additional 50 percent reduction in strategic forces now agreed upon....

Defense. Republicans call for a controlled defense draw-down, not a free fall. That is why President Bush proposes to carefully reduce defense spending over the next four years by an additional $34 billion, including $18 billion in outlays, with a 25 percent reduction in personnel. He has already eliminated over 100 weapon systems. Around the world, American forces are coming home from the frontiers of the Cold War. More than 550 overseas bases are being closed or realigned. Yet U.S. forces retain the ability to meet the challenge of another Desert Storm with equal success....

We applaud the president's efforts to assist all individuals and communities adversely affected by the ongoing defense build-down, with more than 30 defense adjustment programs already in place and more than $7 billion committed to the effort in just the next two years....

Independent Perot

The 1992 independent candidacy of Texas billionaire H. Ross Perot began with a call-in television show rather than with a nominating convention. Undeclared at first, the Perot candidacy began February 20 with his appearance on CNN's Larry King Live, when Perot expressed a willingness to run for president. Under King's prodding, Perot said that if the people "register me in fifty states," he would use his own money for a "world-class campaign."

Perot, a Naval Academy graduate who founded his computer company after leaving IBM, had been in the public eye for years, financing expeditions to help find American prisoners in Vietnam and rescue his employees in Iran, reforming the Texas school system, trying to shake up General Motors' management, and appearing on radio and TV talk shows to warn about the mounting federal deficit.

Tens of thousands of volunteers responded to Perot's challenge and began circulating petitions to place his name on the ballot in states from coast to coast. Meanwhile, Perot began forming a campaign organization. Polls in early spring showed him leading both President George H. W. Bush and challenger Clinton. In June he hired as strategists Hamilton Jordan, manager of Carter's 1976 and 1980 campaigns, and Edward J. Rollins, manager of Reagan's 1984 reelection campaign.

But Perot's standing in the polls began to fall as the media spotlight produced a spate of negative publicity about his quirky personality and fitness to operate within the political system he pledged to reform. On July 16 Perot abruptly announced he was dropping out of the race and closing down his operation.

Perot gave several reasons for his decision. He said he "didn't have any drive to be president" and that he was concerned the election would be thrown to the House of Representatives if he took enough votes from Bush and Clinton to deny both the required electoral vote majority. Earlier he had complained that Republican dirty tricks were undermining his campaign.

By this time Perot had qualified for the ballot in twenty-four states and was well on his way to the goal of qualifying in all fifty states. His disappointed followers felt betrayed by the sudden withdrawal.

But just as suddenly, Perot was back in the race. On October 16 he said he was returning because the major parties had failed to address the problems he had been highlighting in his speeches, both as a private citizen and a political candidate. "We gave them a chance," he said, "They didn't do it."

With the campaign revived, volunteers succeeded in getting Perot on the ballot in every state. Because some states required that he have a running mate, Perot chose retired admiral and former Vietnam War prisoner James B. Stockdale of California. The campaign, which Perot called United We Stand America, later became the Reform Party, which nominated Perot for president in 1996. The organization had no formal platform in 1992 or 1996.

Republicans

The Republican Party on August 12–15 showcased GOP presidential nominee Robert J. "Bob" Dole, the former Senate majority leader from Kansas, and his vice-presidential selection, former New York representative Jack F. Kemp, at the party's nominating convention in San Diego, Calif. Seeking to energize loyalists while also expanding its base, the convention's carefully orchestrated moments melded the twin themes of compassion and conservatism.

Organizers succeeded in banishing any hint of controversy and leaving the delegates with little to do but wave their colorful Dole-Kemp placards and present a picture of enthusiastic party unity for the network television cameras. The paucity of controversy cheered Republicans, who still remembered the 1992 convention in Houston that was marked by strident speeches on abortion and other hot-button social issues. In contrast, San Diego convention-goers were treated to speech after speech that stressed inclusion and moderation.

The Republican platform—as rigidly conservative as any in recent memory—was the designated forum for the party's sharper ideological right wing. Party moderates were kept happy during convention week with prime-time speaking slots. The social conservatives—who were at least a plurality in the ranks of the delegates—were rarely on stage during prime time.

On Monday, August 17, the delegates formally adopted the 1996 party platform by voice vote at the convention's sparsely attended opening morning session. The smooth and swift approval belied the fierce, prolonged struggle over the plank calling for a constitutional amendment to ban abortion. During platform deliberations the week before the convention, social conservatives who dominated the platform-writing process soundly defeated multiple amendments to soften the abortion plank or acknowledge differing views of the issue within the party. At the urging of the Dole campaign, however, the platform committee agreed to add the texts of defeated amendments as an appendix headed “Minority Views.” Thereafter, also at the urging of the Dole camp, abortion rights advocates dropped their planned protest on the convention floor.

Even most of the delegates pledged to conservative commentator Patrick J. Buchanan seemed to approve of the deal. Although Buchanan was denied a podium speech and his delegates were not allowed to place his name in nomination, his supporters said they appreciated the tone of unity and found plenty of reasons to rally around the Dole-Kemp ticket.

A highlight of the first evening came when Nancy Reagan delivered a tribute to her husband, former president Ronald Reagan, who, suffering from Alzheimer’s disease, did not attend the GOP convention for the first time in more than three decades. The audience barely had a chance to collect its emotions before retired Army general Colin L. Powell marched to the podium and confirmed his status as a rising GOP star. Sounding the theme of the evening—and indeed the convention itself—Powell said the GOP “must always be the party of inclusion.” In a rare acknowledgment of the party’s tensions over social issues that lurked out of sight of the cameras, Powell declared his support for abortion rights and affirmative action.

Reflecting the party’s new emphasis on diversity, female and minority speakers dominated the podium, even though their numbers were disproportionately low among the 1,990 delegates. The selection of New York representative Susan Molinari, an abortion rights supporter, as keynote speaker was another signal to moderates that they were welcome in the party. However, Molinari avoided mentioning abortion in her speech.

In the convention’s most intriguing role reversal, House Speaker and convention chair Newt Gingrich, who rose to power and to controversy as a partisan firebrand, used his one short speaking slot Tuesday to praise volunteer efforts—presenting a softer, warmer side of the Republican Party. Wednesday, August 14, was highlighted by an unconventional appearance by Elizabeth Hanford Dole, the nominee’s wife, who took a handheld microphone to the convention floor to praise her husband’s personal and political qualities.

The delegates formally made Dole their presidential candidate following a nominating speech by Sen. John McCain of Arizona. The roll call of the states proved anticlimactic. It lasted about an hour and a half, yet the balloting was not unanimous. Dole ended up with 1,928 of the 1,990 delegate votes; Buchanan received 43 votes. (Table, p. 744.)

On the final evening, Dole and Kemp delivered acceptance speeches that laid the basis for their campaign against President Bill Clinton. Kemp, a fervent and enthusiastic promoter of the GOP as the party of opportunity, promised that Republican policies—including tax cuts and reduced regulation—would unleash a burst of economic activity benefiting all Americans.

In his speech, Dole prominently mentioned his proposed across-the-board, 15 percent income tax cut that had become the centerpiece of his campaign. But he also prescribed racial and ethnic inclusion as a dictum for the party. “If there is anyone who has mistakenly attached himself to our party in the belief that we are not open to citizens of every race and religion, then let me remind you,” Dole said sternly, “tonight this hall belongs to the party of Lincoln, and the exits, which are clearly marked, are for you to walk out of as I stand this ground without compromise.”

Yet no matter how well Dole and the Republicans papered over differences at the convention, the party remained split between its traditional base of fiscal conservatives and its new base of social-issue activists who wanted to see their positions turned into policy.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 1996:

Tax Relief. American families are suffering from the twin burdens of stagnant incomes and near-record taxes.... American families deserve better. They should be allowed to keep more of their hard-earned money so they can spend on their priorities....

In response to this unprecedented burden confronting America, we support an across-the-board, 15-percent tax cut to marginal tax rates.... To remove impediments to job creation and economic growth, we support reducing the top tax rate on capital gains by 50 percent.... The income tax on Social Security benefits ... must be repealed....

To protect the American people from those who would undo their forthcoming victory over big government, we support legislation requiring a super-majority vote in both houses of Congress to raise taxes....

Balancing the Budget. ... Republicans support a Balanced Budget Amendment to the Constitution, phased in over a short period and with appropriate safeguards for national emergencies....

Homeownership. ... We support transforming public housing into private housing, converting low-income families into proud homeowners. Resident management of public housing is a first step toward that goal, which includes eliminating the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). HUD’s core functions will be turned over to the states....

Changing Washington, D.C., from the Ground Up. ... We support elimination of the Departments of Commerce, Housing and Urban Development, Education, and Energy, and the elimination, defunding or privatization of agencies which are obsolete, redundant, of limited value, or too regional in focus. Examples of agencies.... are the National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting and the Legal Services Corporation....

Government Reform. ... True reform is indeed needed: ending taxpayer subsidies for campaigns, strengthening party structures to guard against rogue operations, requiring full and immediate disclosure of all contributions, and cracking down on the indirect support, or “soft money,” by which special interest groups underwrite their favored candidates....

Regulatory Reform. ... A Republican administration will require periodic review of existing regulations to ensure they are effective and do away with obsolete and conflicting rules. We will encourage civil servants to find ways to reduce regulatory burdens on the public and will require federal agencies to disclose the costs of new regulations on individuals and small businesses.... We will require agencies to conduct cost-benefit analyses of their regulations....

Restoring Justice to the Courts. ... The federal judiciary, including the U.S. Supreme Court, has overstepped its authority under the Constitution. It has usurped the right of citizen legislators and popularly elected executives to make law by declaring duly enacted laws to be “unconstitutional” through the misapplication of the principle of judicial review.... A Republican president will ensure that a process is established to select for the federal judiciary nominees who understand that their task is first and foremost to be faithful to the Constitution and to the intent of those who framed it....

The Nation’s Capital. ... We reaffirm the constitutional status of the District of Columbia as the seat of government of the United States and reject calls for statehood for the District.... We call for structural reform of the city’s government and its education system....

Upholding the Rights of All. ... We oppose discrimination based on sex, race, age, creed, or national origin and will vigorously enforce anti-discrimination statutes. We reject the distortion of those laws to cover sexual preference, and we endorse the Defense of Marriage Act to prevent states from being forced to recognize same-sex unions. Because we believe rights inhere in individuals, not in groups, we will attain our nation’s goal of equal rights without quotas or other forms of preferential treatment....

The unborn child has a fundamental individual right to life which cannot be infringed. We support a human life amendment to the Constitution and we endorse legislation to make clear that the Fourteenth Amendment’s protections apply to unborn children. Our purpose is to have legislative and judicial protection of that right against those who perform abortions....

We applaud Bob Dole’s commitment to revoke the Clinton executive orders concerning abortion and to sign into law an end to partial-birth abortions....

We defend the constitutional right to keep and bear arms....

A Sensible Immigration Policy. ... Illegal aliens should not receive public benefits other than emergency aid, and those who become parents while illegally in the United States should not be qualified to claim benefits for their offspring. Legal immigrants should depend for assistance on their sponsors, who are legally responsible for their financial well-being, not the American taxpayers....

From Many, One. ... While we benefit from our differences, we must also strengthen the ties that bind us to one another. Foremost among those is the flag. Its deliberate desecration is not “free speech,” but an assault against our history and our hopes. We support a constitutional amendment that will restore to the people, through their elected representatives, their right to safeguard Old Glory....

We support the official recognition of English as the nation’s common language....

Improving Education. ... The federal government has no constitutional authority to be involved in school curricula or to control jobs in the workplace. That is why we will abolish the Department of Education, end federal meddling in our schools and promote family choice at all levels of learning....

We will continue to work for the return of voluntary prayer to our schools....

Health Care. Our goal is to maintain the quality of America’s health care—the best in the world, bar none—while making health care and health insurance more accessible and more affordable....

We reaffirm our determination to protect Medicare. We will ensure a significant annual expansion in Medicare. That isn’t “cutting Medicare.” It’s a projected average annual rate of growth of 7.1 percent a year—more than twice the rate of inflation—to ensure coverage for those who need it now and those who will need it in the future ....

The Middle East. ... We applaud the Republican Congress for enacting legislation to recognize Jerusalem as the undivided capital of Israel. A Republican administration will ensure that the U.S. Embassy is moved to Jerusalem by May 1999....

The Men and Women of Defense. ... We affirm that homosexuality is incompatible with military service.... We reaffirm our support for the exemption of women from ground combat units and are concerned about the current policy of involuntarily assigning women to combat or near-combat units....

Reform

Founded in fall 1995 by Texas billionaire and presidential aspirant H. Ross Perot, the Reform Party conducted its first presidential nominating convention in an unusual two-stage process. The first session convened in Long Beach, Calif., on August 11, 1996, and the second session met one week later across the country at Valley Forge, Pa., on August 18. During the intervening week, ballots were sent to 1.3 million Reform Party members who voted in a “national primary” for the candidate of their choice by mail, electronic mail, or phone—an array of methods that party officials clearly saw as the election system of the future.

Perot had spent an estimated $6 million of his own money in bankrolling the party. After winning 19 percent of the popular vote in his unsuccessful independent bid against Democrat Clinton and Republican President

George H. W. Bush in the 1992 presidential election, Perot had formed the nonpartisan education organization, United We Stand America (UWSA), to promote his ideas on the national agenda. In 1995 Perot and UWSA supporters spun off the Reform Party as a full-fledged political party.

The California session drew roughly 2,000 members—a fairly homogeneous group demographically, overwhelmingly white, and predominantly middle-aged or older. In the main, they tended to be politically disenchanted, strong proponents of the military, and strong supporters of reform in the mechanics of government and electoral politics.

Speeches by the party's two presidential candidates—Perot and former Democratic governor Richard D. Lamm of Colorado—highlighted the first session, which was televised nationally on C-SPAN and CNN. Lamm took a number of swipes at the Democrats and Republicans, saying “They do not enjoy a right of perpetual existence.” But he also made it clear he was an alternative to Perot. “The torch must pass,” said Lamm. “The Reform Party is larger than any one individual.”

Lamm echoed Perot in urging the party to build on the need for campaign reform, fiscal responsibility, and increased immigration controls. The latter issue, in particular, struck a chord with the Long Beach audience, which responded with cheers when Lamm declared that “the Statue of Liberty stands for liberty, not unlimited immigration.”

But if Lamm spoke politely, like an invited guest, Perot played the garrulous host. Perot had every reason to be optimistic. He led Lamm by a ratio of more than 2-to-1 in the first round of nomination balloting that determined the party's primary finalists. “I want to be your president,” Perot declared, trying to dispel memories of 1992, when he abruptly quit the presidential race in July, only to reenter in October.

During the following week, Lamm criticized the ground rules of the party's nominating process, which were devised by Perot operatives. “I don't think it has been a fair playing field or party-building endeavor as I was promised,” he said.

The modern balloting system had its snags, too. Some participants complained that they did not receive ballots in time to vote. Even Lamm had trouble obtaining a ballot for himself. In the final tally, only 5 percent of the party's declared membership voted. On August 17, national coordinator Russell Verney announced that Perot had won the nomination by taking 65 percent of the primary vote to Lamm's 35 percent.

In his acceptance speech the following day at the Valley Forge convention center, Perot stressed the issues he was known for—reduced federal debt, lobbying reform, and higher ethical standards for elected officials. Perot especially ripped both parties for not following through on promising to form a task force to reform campaign finance. Despite his earlier criticism of public financing—Perot had spent more than $60 million to self-finance his 1992 campaign—he announced that he would accept federal matching funds in 1996. But in accepting the nearly $30 million in public matching funds for which he qualified, Perot had to limit his personal funding to $50,000. At the end of his speech, Perot urged supporters to contribute to his campaign, as a telephone number flashed on screens behind him. Perot then hastened from the stage for an appearance on CNN's Larry King Live, the program on which he made many of his campaign announcements in 1992 and 1996.

The Reform Party did not have a formal 1996 platform.

Democrats

Meeting in Chicago for the eleventh time in the party's history, the Democratic Party on August 26–29 jubilantly renominated President Clinton and Vice President Albert “Al” Gore Jr. Democratic officials produced a convention designed to stir the viewing public's emotions. Speakers and videos highlighted the party's racial and ethnic diversity, while drawing attention to Clinton's efforts to ease the burdens on middle-class families. Taking advantage of meeting two weeks after the Republicans nominated Dole, Democrats repeatedly hammered away at Dole's offer to be “a bridge to the past” as proof that the GOP wanted to turn back the clock on economic, social, and cultural change.

Despite the apparent unity, the convention exposed the unresolved philosophical divisions between the party's liberal and centrist wings. Members of centrist Democratic Party groups such as the Blue Dogs, a group of House deficit hawks, and the Democratic Leadership Council insisted that their blueprint for smaller government was gradually becoming the party's dominant position. They pointed to the 1996 platform, adopted without dissent August 27, which was generally more conservative than past documents. “Our platform calls for a balanced budget,” said Rep. Charles W. Stenholm of Texas. “That's a first.”

Some veteran liberals, such as Rep. Charles B. Rangel of New York, acknowledged the party's move to the center. “America has shifted on us,” Rangel said. “Americans should be prepared to raise the taxes, invest in productivity, and create the jobs. But they can't support that. They'd rather cut taxes, invest in defense, and build jails.”

The high point of the first evening was the appearance of a pair of lifelong Republicans: former Ronald Reagan press secretary James S. Brady, and his wife, Sarah. In a reference to the Republican convention, Sarah Brady said, “Jim, we must have made a wrong turn. This isn't San Diego.” The Bradys, who had become gun control proponents after James Brady was partially paralyzed from being shot during the 1981 attempt to assassinate President Reagan, called for increased efforts to reduce gun violence. They praised Clinton for enacting the Brady bill, which imposed a seven-day waiting period for handgun purchases.

Actor Christopher Reeve, paralyzed from a horse-riding accident in 1995, capped the evening's speeches with a plea for compassion and assistance to Americans with disabilities. Reeve, speaking from a wheelchair, held the hushed audience's attention as he called for increased research funding for multiple sclerosis, Parkinson's disease, spinal cord injuries, and AIDS.

On the second night former New York governor Mario M. Cuomo and civil rights leader Jesse L. Jackson from the liberal wing of the party spoke to the convention—although before the late-night portion of the broadcast by the three major television networks. While the two men agreed to disagree with the president over welfare reform, they launched some of the harshest partisan attacks of the convention. Cuomo proclaimed a need to elect a Democratic majority to Congress to fend off the Republicans' conservative agenda. "They are the real threat," he said. Jackson focused on the need to improve conditions in economically deprived sections of the United States. His repeated plea to "keep that faith" with poor and struggling Americans became a chant echoed by the rapt audience.

Following the keynote speech by Gov. Evan Bayh of Indiana, the evening's theme was "Families First." Speakers included an opponent of abortion, Rep. Tony P. Hall of Ohio. "Many of us have felt left out [in the past]," Hall said. "This year it's different." In 1992 Pennsylvania's antiabortion governor, Robert P. Casey, had not been permitted to speak at the Democratic convention. The final speaker, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, closed out the evening with a passionate explanation of her view of family values.

The next night Gore's speech broke tradition by being scheduled the day before the president's acceptance speech. Gore rallied the convention with sharp jabs at the Republican nominee. "In his speech from San Diego, Senator Dole offered himself as a bridge to the past," said Gore. "Tonight, Bill Clinton and I offer ourselves as a bridge to the future."

But the most memorable part of his speech was a deeply personal glimpse at a family tragedy. Seeking to underscore the dangers of underage smoking, Gore recounted the final, painful days and hours of his sister who began smoking at age thirteen and ultimately died of lung cancer.

The nomination of Clinton followed, with Sen. Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut, the DNC general chairman, hailing the president for leading the nation into an era of prosperity, while courageously taking on powerful special interests such as the gun lobby and the tobacco industry. The formality of the presidential roll call was the culmination of the evening. The final tally was announced as a unanimous 4,289 votes for Clinton, although there appeared to be roughly a dozen votes that were not cast during the roll call. (Table, p. 745.)

President Clinton capped the Democratic convention with a sixty-six-minute policy address that chronicled his administration's accomplishments. The president's speech was designed to burnish his centrist image and lay the foundation for a second term. In his address, the president resolved to "build a bridge to the twenty-first century, to meet our values and protect our values."

Clinton promised to balance the budget without threatening Medicare and Medicaid, education programs, or environmental protection. He also proposed a series of modest initiatives including deploying of 30,000 reading specialists to help enlist 1 million volunteer reading tutors, expanding controls on handgun sales, providing targeted tax cuts such as tax credits and deductions for college tuition and tax breaks for first-time home buyers, and increasing funding for cleaning up superfund toxic waste sites.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 1996:

Balancing the Budget. ... In 1992, we promised to cut the deficit in half over four years. We did. Our 1993 economic plan cut spending by over a quarter trillion dollars in five years.... Now the Democratic Party is determined to finish the job and balance the budget. President Clinton has put forward a plan to balance the budget by 2002 while living up to our commitments to our elderly and our children and maintaining strong economic growth.... Today's Democratic Party believes we have a duty to care for our parents, so they can live their lives in dignity. That duty includes securing Medicare and Medicaid, finding savings without reducing quality or benefits, and protecting Social Security for future generations....

Tax Relief. ... Today's Democratic Party is committed to targeted tax cuts that help working Americans invest in their future, and we insist that any tax cuts are completely paid for, because we are determined to balance the budget....

Foreign Trade. We believe that if we want the American economy to continue strong growth, we must continue to expand trade, and not retreat from the world.... We must continue to work to lower foreign trade barriers....

Education. ... In the next four years, we must do even more to make sure America has the best public schools on earth.... We must hold students, teachers, and schools to the highest standards. Every child should be able to read by the end of the third grade. Students should be required to demonstrate competency and achievement for promotion or graduation. Teachers should be required to meet high standards for professional performance and be rewarded for the good jobs they do—and there should be a fair, timely, cost-effective process to remove those who do not measure up.... We should expand public school choice, but we should not take American tax dollars from public schools and give them to private schools. We should promote public charter schools that are held to the highest standards of accountability and access....

Health Care. The Democratic Party is committed to ensuring that Americans have access to affordable, high-quality health care.... In the next four years, we must take further steps to ensure that Americans have access to quality, affordable health care. We should start by making sure that people get help paying premiums so they do not lose health care while they're looking for a new job. We support expanded coverage of home care, hospice, and community-based services, so the elderly and people with disabilities of all ages can live in their own communities and as independently as possible. We ... believe health insurance coverage for mental health care is vitally important and we support parity for mental health care.

Retirement. ... We want ... to make sure people can carry their pensions with them when they change jobs, protect pensions even further, and expand the number of workers with pension coverage. Democrats created Social Security, we oppose efforts to dismantle it, and we will fight to save it. We must ensure that it is on firm financial footing well into the next century...

Fighting Crime. ... President Clinton beat back fierce Republican opposition... to answer the call of America's police officers and pass the toughest Crime Bill in history... And it is making a difference. In city after city and town after town, crime rates are finally coming down... Any attempt to repeal the Brady Bill or assault weapons ban will be met with a veto. We must do everything we can to stand behind our police officers, and the first thing we should do is pass a ban on cop-killer bullets...

Immigration. ... We support a legal immigration policy that is pro-family, pro-work, pro-responsibility, and pro-citizenship, and we deplore those who blame immigrants for economic and social problems... We cannot tolerate illegal immigration and we must stop it...

We deplore those who use the need to stop illegal immigration as a pretext for discrimination. And we applaud the wisdom of Republicans ... who oppose the mean-spirited and shortsighted effort of Republicans in Congress to bar the children of illegal immigrants from schools...

Welfare Reform. ... Over the past four years, President Clinton has dramatically transformed the welfare system... Welfare rolls are finally coming down—there are 1.3 million fewer people on welfare today than there were when President Clinton took office in January 1993.

... Thanks to President Clinton and the Democrats, the new welfare bill imposes time limits and real work requirements... Thanks to President Clinton and the Democrats, the new welfare bill cracks down on deadbeat parents and requires minor mothers to live at home with their parents or with another responsible adult...

Abortion. The Democratic Party stands behind the right of every woman to choose, consistent with Roe v. Wade, and regardless of ability to pay. President Clinton took executive action to make sure that the right to make such decisions is protected for all Americans. Over the last four years, we have taken action to end the gag rule and ensure safety at family planning and women's health clinics. We believe it is a fundamental constitutional liberty that individual Americans—not government—can best take responsibility for making the most difficult and intensely personal decisions regarding reproduction...

Political Reform. ... The President and the Democratic Party support the bipartisan McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform bill. It will limit campaign spending, curb the influence of PACs and lobbyists, and end the soft money system. Perhaps most important of all, this bill provides free TV time for candidates, so they can talk directly to citizens about real issues and real ideas... It is time to take the reins of democracy away from big money and put them back in the hands of the American people, where they belong. We applaud efforts by broadcasters and private citizens alike, to increase candidates' direct access to voters through free TV...

The Middle East. ... Jerusalem is the capital of Israel and should remain an undivided city accessible to people of all faiths. We are also committed to working with our Arab partners for peace to build a brighter, more secure and prosperous future for all the people of the Middle East...

Protecting Our Environment. ... We are committed to protecting the majestic legacy of our National Parks... We will be good stewards of our old-growth forests, oppose new offshore oil drilling and mineral exploration and production in our nation's many environmentally critical areas, and protect our oceans from oil spills and the dumping of toxic and radioactive waste...

Fighting Discrimination. Today's Democratic Party knows we must renew our efforts to stamp out discrimination and hatred of every kind, wherever and whenever we see it... We believe everyone in America should learn English so they can fully share in our daily life, but we strongly oppose divisive efforts like English-only legislation...

Religious Freedom. Today's Democratic Party understands that all Americans have a right to express their faith... Americans have a right to express their love of God in public, and we applaud the President's work to ensure that children are not denied private religious expression in school...

Republicans

Meeting July 31–August 3 in Philadelphia, the Republican Party nominated George W. Bush, the son of a president, as the GOP standard-bearer for 2000. The proud father, former president George H. W. Bush, was among the many family members applauding the party's choice. Delegates hoped a victory by Texas governor Bush would give the nation its second father-son presidential pair. The first was Federalist John Adams (1797–1801) and Democratic-Republican John Quincy Adams (1825–1829).

In another historical irony, the nomination pitted Bush against Vice President Albert “Al” Gore Jr., who with Clinton halted twelve years of Republican control of the White House and who hoped to extend the Democrats’ eight-year administration, just as had George H. W. Bush for the GOP on Ronald Reagan’s retirement in 1988.

In their acceptance speeches Bush and his running mate, former defense secretary Richard B. Cheney, assailed the Democrats for overlooking the opportunities of an overflowing treasury. “For eight years the Clinton-Gore administration has coasted through prosperity,” Bush said. “So much promise to no great purpose. Instead of seizing this moment, the ... administration has squandered it.” Similarly the party’s 32,000-word platform was replete with references to prosperity and ways to use it, chiefly through tax cuts, which Bush said would benefit all taxpayers and not just the rich.

Bush’s nomination at Philadelphia’s First Union Center was strictly a formality. He, like Gore, had secured the nomination months earlier through primary victories that won him enough delegates to eliminate the competition. The next strongest primary candidate, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, endorsed Bush and released his delegates to him. For the vote, the convention planners used a novel “rolling roll call” that took several days. Bush and Cheney won the votes of all 2,066 delegates. (Table, p. 746.)

In keeping with the convention’s themes of unity and inclusion, there were no floor fights on rules or on platform planks. Averting one such fight, the rules committee rejected, 66–33, the so-called Delaware plan to limit the GOP presidential primary schedule to four months, with smaller states voting first. The Republican National Committee approved the plan, but big states objected that it would weaken their strength in the delegate-selection process.

A floor fight was also avoided over the issue of abortion. Moderates tried unsuccessfully to remove platform language supporting a constitutional ban on abortion, fearing that it would hurt GOP candidates, especially among women voters. Bush told the delegates that as president he would sign a ban on partial-birth abortions if Congress sent him one.

Although only 4 percent of the delegates were African Americans, the convention gave prominent roles to minorities. African American retired general Colin L. Powell gave the keynote address. Among other speakers were the nominee’s wife, Laura Bush, as well as Hispanics and a gay House member, Jim Kolbe of Arizona. As Kolbe spoke several Texas delegates removed their cowboy hats and bowed heads to show, as one put it, that they were not “condoning perversion.”

The platform reaffirmed the party’s opposition to homosexuality in the military, but in other ways it reflected Bush’s self-described “compassionate conservatism.” Missing were past GOP calls for eliminating the Education and Energy departments, as well as federal agencies supporting the arts and humanities. Added was a new women’s health section supporting more research on diseases that disproportionately affect women. The document also welcomed “New Americans” in a softened stance on immigration.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 2000:

Taxes and Budget. ... When the average American family has to work more than four months out of every year to fund all levels of government, it's time to change the tax system, to make it simpler, flatter, and fairer for everyone. It's time for an economics of inclusion that will let people keep more of what they earn and accelerate movement up the opportunity ladder.

We therefore enthusiastically endorse the principles of Governor Bush's Tax Cut with a Purpose:

- Replace the five current tax brackets with four lower ones, ensuring all taxpayers significant tax relief while targeting it especially toward low-income workers.

- Help families by doubling the child tax credit to $1,000, making it available to more families, and eliminating the marriage penalty.

- Encourage entrepreneurship and growth by capping the top marginal rate, ending the death tax, and making permanent the Research and Development credit.

- Promote charitable giving and education. Foster capital investment and savings to boost today's dangerously low personal savings rate....

Family Matters. We support the traditional definition of “marriage” as the legal union of one man and one woman, and we believe that federal judges and bureaucrats should not force states to recognize other living arrangements as marriages.... We do not believe sexual preference should be given special legal protection or standing in law.

Education.... Raise academic standards through increased local control and accountability to parents, shrinking a multitude of federal programs into five flexible grants in exchange for real, measured progress in student achievement.

... We recognize that... the role of the federal government must be progressively limited as we return control to parents, teachers, and local school boards.... The Republican Congress rightly opposed attempts by the Department of Education to establish federal testing that would set the stage for a national curriculum. We believe it's time to test the Department, and each of its programs, instead....

Abortion. ... The Supreme Court's recent decision, prohibiting states from banning partial-birth abortions—a procedure denounced by a committee of the American Medical Association and rightly branded as four-fifths infanticide—shocks the conscience of the nation. As a country, we must keep our pledge to the first guarantee of the Declaration of Independence. That is why we say the unborn child has a fundamental individual right to life which cannot be infringed. We support a human life amendment to the Constitution and we endorse legislation to make clear that the Fourteenth Amendment's protections apply to unborn children....

Gun Laws. ... We defend the constitutional right to keep and bear arms, and we affirm the individual responsibility to safely use and store firearms.... Although we support background checks to ensure that guns do not fall into the hands of criminals, we oppose federal licensing of law-abiding gun owners and national gun registration as a violation of the Second Amendment and an invasion of privacy of honest citizens....

New Americans. ... Our country's ethnic diversity within a shared national culture is unique in all the world. We benefit from our differences, but we must also strengthen the ties that bind us to one another. Foremost among those is the flag. Its deliberate desecration is not “free speech” but an assault against both our proud history and our greatest hopes. We therefore support a constitutional amendment that will restore to the people, through their elected representatives, their right to safeguard Old Glory.

Another sign of our unity is the role of English as our common language.... For newcomers, it has always been the fastest route to the mainstream of American life. English empowers. That is why fluency in English must be the goal of bilingual education programs. We support the recognition of English as the nation's common language. At the same time, mastery of other languages is important for America's competitiveness in the world market....

As a nation of immigrants, we welcome all new Americans who have entered lawfully and are prepared to follow our laws and provide for themselves and their families. In their search for a better life, they strengthen our economy, enrich our culture, and defend the nation in war and in peace. To ensure fairness for those wishing to reside in this country, and to meet the manpower needs of our expanding economy, a total overhaul of the immigration system is sorely needed....

Saving Social Security. ... Anyone currently receiving Social Security, or close to being eligible for it, will not be impacted by any changes. Key changes should merit bipartisan agreement so any reforms will be a win for the American people rather than a political victory for any one party....

Personal savings accounts must be the cornerstone of restructuring. Each of today's workers should be free to direct a portion of their payroll taxes to personal investments for their retirement future.... Today's financial markets offer a variety of investment options, including some that guarantee a rate of return higher than the current Social Security system with no risk to the investor....

Health Care. ... Medicare, at age 35, needs a new lease on life. It's time to bring this program, so critical for 39 million seniors and individuals with disabilities, into the Twenty-first Century. It's time to modernize the benefit package to match current medical science, improve the program's financial stability, and cut back the bureaucratic jungle that is smothering it. It's time to give older Americans access to the same health insurance plan the Congress has created for itself, so that seniors will have the same choices and security as Members of Congress, including elimination of all current limitations and restrictions that prevent the establishment of medical savings accounts....

We intend to save this beleaguered system with a vision of health care adapted to the changing demands of a new century. It is as simple, and yet as profound, as this: All Americans should have access to high-quality and affordable health care.... In achieving that goal, we will promote a health care system that supports, not supplants, the private sector; that promotes personal responsibility in health care decision-making; and that ensures the least intrusive role for the federal government....

Energy. ... By any reasonable standard, the Department of Energy has utterly failed in its mission to safeguard America's energy security. The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission has been no better, and the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) has been shutting off America's energy pipeline with a regulatory blitz that has only just begun. In fact, 36 oil refineries have closed in just the last eight years, while not a single new refinery has been built in this country in the last quarter-century. EPA's patchwork of regulations has driven fuel prices higher in some areas than in others....

A Military for the Twenty-First Century. ... Over the past seven years, a shrunken American military has been run ragged by a deployment tempo that has eroded its military readiness. Many units have seen their operational requirements increased four-fold, wearing out both people and equipment. Only last fall the Army certified two of its premier combat divisions as unready for war because of underfunding, mismanagement, and over commitment to peacekeeping missions around the globe. More Army units and the other armed services report similar problems. It is a national scandal that almost one quarter of our Army's active combat strength is unfit for wartime duty....

The new Republican government will renew the bond of trust between the Commander-in-Chief, the American military, and the American people. The military is not a civilian police force or a political referee. We believe the military must no longer be the object of social experiments. We affirm traditional military culture. We affirm that homosexuality is incompatible with military service....

The Middle East and Persian Gulf. ... It is important for the United States to support and honor Israel, the only true democracy in the Middle East. We will ensure that Israel maintains a qualitative edge in defensive technology over any potential adversaries. We will not pick sides in Israeli elections. The United States has a moral and legal obligation to maintain its Embassy and Ambassador in Jerusalem. Immediately upon taking office, the next Republican president will begin the process of moving the U.S. Embassy from Tel Aviv to Israel's capital, Jerusalem....

Democrats

Declaring himself "my own man," Vice President Al Gore stepped from the shadow of President Clinton and accepted the Democratic Party's nomination for president on the final night of the party's August 14–17 convention at Los Angeles's Staples Center. Reinforcing the independence he sought to portray, Gore earlier had taken a gamble unprecedented in American politics. He chose as his running mate Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, the first person of Jewish descent to run on a major party's national ticket. Besides being of a religious minority, Lieberman had at times broken with his party on economic issues and had sternly deplored Clinton's sexual affair with Monica Lewinsky.

But the convention delegates enthusiastically accepted Gore's choice of Lieberman as his partner against George W. Bush and Cheney, the Republican ticket named two weeks earlier in Philadelphia. Like Bush and Cheney, Gore and Lieberman won the unanimous approval of their respective delegates. Gore had locked up the presidential nomination by defeating former senator Bill Bradley in the Democratic primaries. In a convention speech, Bradley urged Gore's election.

Most public opinion polls showed Gore trailing Bush before the conventions. Afterward both nominees received a "bounce" from their convention performances, but Gore's choice of running mate and his "my own man" ploy appeared to have been somewhat more popular than Bush's effort. Polls after the Democratic convention showed Gore leading Bush slightly.

Although Gore had been in the public eye for much of his life—as a House member, senator, and eight years as vice president—he devoted much of his acceptance speech to telling the delegates and television audience "who I truly am." He told of growing up in Carthage, Tennessee, and paid tribute to his recently deceased father, former senator Albert A. Gore, and his mother, one of the first woman graduates of Vanderbilt University Law School.

He praised Clinton as "a leader who moved us out of the valley of recession and into the longest period of prosperity in American history." But he also distanced himself from the moral behavior in office that led to Clinton's impeachment and Senate trial. "If you entrust me with the presidency, I know I won't always be the most exciting politician," Gore said, adding, "I will never let you down."

Even Clinton seemed to recognize Gore's need to shake loose the moral baggage of the president he had served for eight years. In his farewell speech to the convention, Clinton praised Gore's character as an adviser, leader, and champion of ordinary Americans. Choosing Gore as his partner, Clinton said, was "one of the very best decisions of my life."

Gore's speech and the party platform stressed the prosperity and budget surpluses achieved during Clinton's two terms. Gore pledged to continue balancing the budget while delivering "the right kind of tax cuts." The Bush kind, he said, would benefit the wealthy and leave little to pay down the national debt or meet the needs of poor and working families. "They're for the powerful," Gore said. "We're for the people."

Although Lieberman voted against conviction of Clinton after earlier criticizing him from the Senate floor, he had been an advocate of moral decency long before the Lewinsky affair came to light. Gore's wife, Tipper, had a similar background as a critic of explicit rock music in the 1980s. Despite Hollywood's importance as a revenue source for the Democrats, the party platform contained a plank calling on the entertainment industry to assume more responsibility in protecting children from violence and cruelty.

Gore's film actor friend and Harvard roommate Tommy Lee Jones nominated Gore. Tipper Gore introduced her husband to the 4,339 delegates. One of Gore's daughters, Karenna Gore Schiff, also spoke to the convention. No other names were placed in nomination, and there were no floor fights over the party rules or platform. (Table, p. 747.)

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 2000:

Fiscal Discipline. ... Today, for most families, the federal tax burden is the lowest it has been in twenty years. The Bush tax slash takes a different course. It is bigger than any cut Newt Gingrich ever dreamed of. It would let the richest one percent of Americans afford a new sports car and middle class Americans afford a warm soda. It is so out-of-step with reality that the Republican Congress refused to enact it. It would undermine the American economy and undercut our prosperity.... Democrats seek the right kind of tax relief—tax cuts that are specifically targeted to help those who need them the most.

Retirement Security. ... The choice for Americans on this vital part of our national heritage has never been more clear: Democrats believe in using our prosperity to save Social Security; the Republicans' tax cut would prevent America from ensuring our senior citizens have a secure retirement. We owe it to America's children and their children to make the strength and solvency of Social Security a major national priority.

That's why Al Gore is committed to making Social Security safe and secure for more than half a century by using the savings from our current unprecedented prosperity to strengthen the Social Security Trust Fund in preparation for the retirement of the Baby Boom generation....

To build on the success of Social Security, Al Gore has proposed the creation of Retirement Savings Plus—voluntary, tax-free, personally-controlled, privately-managed savings accounts with a government match that would help couples build a nest egg of up to $400,000....

Education. ... George W. Bush and the Republican Party offer neither real accountability nor reasonable investment [in education].... Their version of accountability relies on private school vouchers that would offer too few dollars to too few children to escape their failing schools. These vouchers would pass the buck on accountability while pulling bucks out of the schools that need them most....

By the end of the next presidential term, we should have a fully qualified, well trained teacher in every classroom in every school in every part of this country and every teacher should pass a rigorous test to get there.

By the end of the next presidential term, every failing school in America should be turned around—or shut down and reopened under new public leadership....

We should make a college education as universal as high school is today. Al Gore has proposed a new National Tuition Savings program to tie together state tuition savings programs in more than 30 states so that parents can save for college tax-free and inflation-free. We propose a tax cut for tuition and fees for post-high school education and training that allows families to choose either a $10,000 a year tax deduction or a $2,800 tax credit....

Fighting Crime. ... Strong and Sensible Gun Laws.... Democrats believe that we should fight gun crime on all fronts—with stronger laws and stronger enforcement. That's why Democrats fought and passed the Brady Law and the Assault Weapons Ban. We increased federal, state, and local gun crime prosecution by 22 percent since 1992. Now gun crime is down by 35 percent.

Now we must do even more. We need mandatory child safety locks, to protect our children. We should require a photo license I.D., a full background check, and a gun safety test to buy a new handgun in America. We support more federal gun prosecutors, ATF agents and inspectors, and giving states and communities another 10,000 prosecutors to fight gun crime.

Hate Crimes. ... Hate crimes are more than assaults on people, they are assaults on the very idea of America. They should be punished with extra force. Protections should include hate violence based on gender, disability or sexual orientation. And the Republican Congress should stop standing in the way of this pro-civil rights, anti-crime legislation....

Health Care. Universal Health Coverage. There is much more left to do. We must redouble our efforts to bring the uninsured into coverage step-by-step and as soon as possible. We should guarantee access to affordable health care for every child in America. We should expand coverage to working families, including more Medicaid assistance to help with the transition from welfare to work.... In addition, Americans aged 55 to 65—the fastest growing group of uninsured—should be allowed to buy into the Medicare program to get the coverage they need. By taking these steps, we can move our nation closer to the goal of providing universal health coverage for all Americans.

... A Real Patients' Bill of Rights. Medical decisions should be made by patients and their doctors and nurses, not accountants and bureaucrats at the end of a phone line a thousand miles away.... Americans need a real, enforceable Patients' Bill of Rights with the right to see a specialist, the right to appeal decisions to an outside board, guaranteed coverage of emergency room care, and the right to sue when they are unfairly denied coverage....

Protecting and Strengthening Medicare. It is time we ended the tragedy of elderly Americans being forced to choose between meals and medication. It is time we modernized Medicare with a new prescription drug benefit. This is an essential step in making sure that the best new cures and therapies are available to our seniors and disabled Americans. We cannot afford to permit our seniors to receive only part of the medical care they need....

Abortion. Choice. The Democratic Party stands behind the right of every woman to choose, consistent with Roe v. Wade, and regardless of ability to pay. We believe it is a fundamental constitutional liberty that individual Americans—not government—can best take responsibility for making the most difficult and intensely personal decisions regarding reproduction. This year's Supreme Court rulings show to us all that eliminating a woman's right to choose is only one justice away. That's why the stakes in this election are as high as ever....

Campaign Finance Reform. ... The big-time lobbyists and special interest were so eager [in 2000] to invest in George W. Bush and deliver campaign cash to him hand-over-fist that he became the first major party nominee to pull out of the primary election financing structure and refuse to abide by campaign spending limits.

In this year's presidential primaries it became clear that the Republican establishment is violently opposed to John McCain's call for reforming our democracy. Al Gore supports John McCain's campaign for political reform. In fact, the McCain-Feingold bill is the very first piece of legislation that a President Al Gore will submit to Congress—and he will fight for it until it becomes the law of the land.

Then he will go even further—much further. He will insist on tough new lobbying reform, publicly-guaranteed TV time for debates and advocacy by candidates, and a crackdown on special interest issue ads....

Transforming the Military. ... The Democratic Party understands that, good as they are, the armed forces must continue to evolve. They must not only remain prepared for conventional military action, but must sharpen their ability to deal with new missions and new kinds of threats. They must become more agile, more versatile, and must more completely incorporate the revolutionary implications and advantages of American supremacy in information technology.

... A high-tech fighting force must recruit, train, and retain a professional all-volunteer force of the highest caliber.... While the number of soldiers and families on food stamps is down by two-thirds over the past decade, it is unacceptable that any member of our armed forces should have to rely on food stamps. Al Gore is committed to equal treatment of all service members and believes all patriotic Americans be allowed to serve their country without discrimination, persecution, and violence....

Middle East. ... Jerusalem is the capital of Israel and should remain an undivided city accessible to people of all faiths. In view of the government of Israel's courageous decision to withdraw from Lebanon, we believe special responsibility now resides with Syria to make a contribution toward peace. The recently-held Camp David summit, while failing to bridge all the gaps between Israel and the Palestinians, demonstrated President Clinton's resolve to do all the United States could do to bring an end to that long conflict. Al Gore, as president, will demonstrate the same resolve....

Greens

Building on the modest success of his token candidacy four years earlier, consumer advocate Ralph Nader emerged in 2000 as a full-fledged presidential candidate. He accepted the Green Party nomination at its June 25 convention in Denver with a broad-brush attack on the institutions of power in the United States.

Pledging "government of, by, and for the people—not monied interests," Nader called for a collective understanding of the "inequalities afflicting so many of our citizens.... What is so normalized now must be defined as intolerable and unworthy of this great country of ours."

Delegates from thirty-nine state Green parties nominated Nader by a 295–21 vote. They also renominated Native American Winona LaDuke, Nader's 1996 running mate, and ratified a lengthy platform setting forth the party's "key values."

In contrast to 1996, when he won 0.7 percent of the presidential vote as the Greens' nominal candidate in fewer than half the states, with no serious campaigning and only a $5,000 budget, Nader was already an active candidate before the Denver convention. He had barnstormed in all fifty states and had raised $1 million of a projected $5 million war chest. His goal was to win at least 5 percent of the vote, which would entitle the Greens to federal matching campaign funds in 2004.

At age sixty-six, Nader had received widespread respect for his forty-two years of public service in areas of consumer safety, the environment, and economic justice. But his candidacy against Republican Bush and Democrat Gore soured many in his normal constituency, particularly liberals who feared it would hurt Gore. The New York Times, in a June 30 editorial entitled "Mr. Nader's Misguided Crusade," said Nader was engaging in a "self-indulgent exercise" that would distract voters from the clear-cut choices offered by Bush and Gore.

Nader, however, denied being a "spoiler" of Gore's chances. He told reporters, "I'm worried about Gore taking votes away from me."

The candidate devoted much of his nearly two-hour acceptance speech to attacks on "corporate welfare," the "Bush and Gore duopoly," the International Monetary Fund and the World Trade Organization, and "corporatization" that he said is "fast going global" and undermining "our legitimate local, state, and national sovereignties." He called for universal health insurance, a higher minimum wage, and banning or sharply limiting PACs (political action committees) and "soft money" given to parties.

Nader assailed the Commission on Presidential Debates for excluding third-party candidates from the planned debates between the major party nominees. The shutout, he said, limits "the competitive democratic process on which the American electoral system is supposed to be built."

Following are excerpts from the Green Party platform of 2000:

Democracy. A growing and grave imbalance between the often-converging power of Big Business, Big Government and the citizens of this country has seriously damaged our democracy.... It's time to end "corporate welfare" as we know it....

Political Reform. We propose comprehensive campaign finance reform, including caps on spending and contributions, at the national and state level, and/or full public financing of elections to remove undue influence in political campaigns. We will work to ban or greatly limit political action committees and restrict soft money contributions....

The Electoral College is an eighteenth century anachronism. We call for a constitutional amendment abolishing the Electoral College and providing for the direct election of the president by Instant Runoff Voting. Until that time, we call for a proportional allocation of delegates in state primaries.

Foreign Policy. ... Greens believe the more than $300 billion defense budget must be cut. The Green Party calls for military spending to be cut by 50 percent over the next 10 years, with increases in spending for social programs....

It is our belief that the massive debt owed by the Third World is causing immense misery and environmental destruction. Foreign aid must be addressed in the context of retiring this debt and not forcing "structural adjustments" via the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and World Bank on the economies of the underdeveloped world....

Health Care. ... Alongside the many Americans calling for action that makes health care a right, not a privilege, the Green Party states with a clear voice its strong support for universal health care.... We call for passage of legislation at the national and state level that guarantees comprehensive benefits for all Americans. A single-insurer system funded by the federal government and administered at the state and local levels remains viable and is an essential barometer of our national health and well-being....

We believe the right of a woman to control her own body is inalienable. It is essential that the option of a safe, legal abortion remains available....

Social Security. ... The Green Party opposes the "privatization" of Social Security. The Social Security trust fund, contrary to claims being made by Republican and Democrat candidates, is not about to "go broke" and does not need to be "fixed" by Wall Street....

Criminal Justice. ... We support the "Brady Bill" and thoughtful, carefully considered gun control.... We do not support, as a matter of conscience, the death penalty.

Civil and Equal Rights. ... We call for an end to official support for any remaining badges and indicia of slavery and specifically call for the immediate removal of the Confederate battle flag from any and all government buildings because we recognize that, to many, this remains a painful reminder of second-class status on the basis of race....

We affirm the right to openly embrace sexual orientation in the intimate choice of who we love.... We support the rights of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered people in housing, jobs, civil marriage and benefits, child custody—and in all areas of life, the right to be treated equally with all other people....

We will resist discriminatory English-only pressure groups. We call for a national language policy that would encourage all citizens to be fluent in at least two languages.

Energy Policy. ... If we do not alter our energy use soon—and drastically—the ecological crisis may be exacerbated past a point where it can be resolved. A comprehensive energy policy must be a critical element of our environmental thinking. Investing in energy efficiency and renewable energy is key to sustainability.... Extensive conservation measures will bring huge resource savings for both the economy and the environment. Conservation, along with energy efficiency and renewables, is an essential part of an effective energy policy. The Greens call for pervasive efforts on the energy conservation front ....

Nuclear Issues. ... The Green Party recognizes that there is no such thing as nuclear waste "disposal." All six of the "low-level" nuclear waste dumps in the United States have leaked. There are no technological quick fixes which can effectively isolate nuclear waste from the biosphere for the duration of its hazardous life. Therefore, it is essential that generation of additional nuclear wastes be stopped....

The Green Party calls for the early retirement of nuclear power reactors as soon as possible (in no more than five years) and for a phase-out of other technologies that use or produce nuclear waste....

Fossil Fuels. ... We call for transition energy strategies, including the use of relatively clean-burning natural gas, as a way to reorder our energy priorities and over-reliance on traditional fuels.... We call for a gradual phase-out of gasoline and other fossil fuels.

Emissions Reduction. ... With only 4 percent of the earth's people, the United States produces more than 20 percent of emissions. From 1990 to 1996, total U.S. emissions grew by an amount equal to what Brazil and Indonesia produce every year. Per capita, the United States emits 85 percent more than Germany, twice as much as England and Japan, and currently nearly ten times as much as China. The Green Party urges the U.S. Congress to act immediately to address the critical global warming and climate change issues....

Trade. ... We reject trade agreements negotiated in secret and unduly influenced by corporate attorneys and representatives. In particular, we oppose the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA), the General Agreement On Tariffs And Trade (GATT), and its progeny, the World Trade Organization (WTO).... We demand that these agreements be updated to include more specific environmental, worker, health and safety standards in the text itself, not as "side agreements."

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

John F. Kerry
Democrat

George W. Bush
Republican

Democrats

The 2004 Democratic and Republican conventions, the first after the terrorist attacks of 2001, convened under an umbrella of unprecedented security. The federal government alone allocated up to $50 million for protection at each meeting. In late July, the Democrats gathered at the Fleet Center in Boston—the first time either major party had met in that city. It was also the home town of the party’s presidential nominee, John F. Kerry.

The Democrats, as has become the norm for recent conventions, put on a unified display throughout the four-day event as the 4,964 delegates and alternates were hopeful of unseating incumbent president George W. Bush. Many convention attendees were angry at the Bush administration for its rationale, later discredited, for going to war with Iraq, for its inadequate preparation for the war’s aftermath, and for the mounting toll in U.S. casualties and deaths. Some Democrats still refused to accept the legitimacy of Bush’s presidency after the bitterly controversial 2000 election.

One of the first speakers on July 26 was former president Jimmy Carter, who said that “recent policies have cost our nation its reputation as the world’s most admired champion of freedom and justice. What a difference these few months of extremism have made.... With our allies disunited, the world resenting us, and the Middle East ablaze, we need John Kerry to restore life to the global war against terrorism.”

Also speaking on the first night was former president Bill Clinton and his wife, Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York. In his remarks the former president, who received a draft deferment during the Vietnam War, contrasted Kerry with himself, President George W. Bush, and Vice President Richard B. Cheney. Clinton said that “many young men, including the current president, the vice president, and me, could have gone to Vietnam and didn’t. John Kerry came from a privileged background. He could have avoided going, too, but instead, he said: Send me.” Now it was time, Clinton said, “to say to him what he has always said to America: Send me.”

One surprising speaker for the Democrats on the first night was a Reagan, Ron Reagan, son of former Republican president Ronald Reagan, who had recently died. Reagan spoke in support of medical research using embryonic stem cells to help find cures for spinal cord injuries and diseases such as Alzheimer’s, which had afflicted his father after he left the presidency. His mother, Nancy Reagan, also had publicly opposed the Bush administration’s strict limitations on funding for stem cell research. The Democratic platform supported limited research.

On July 27 Senate candidate Barack Obama of Illinois, the son of a student from Kenya, gave the convention’s keynote speech. The self-described “skinny kid with a funny name,” said: “The audacity of hope! That is God’s greatest gift to us, the bedrock of this nation, the belief in things not seen, the belief that there are better days ahead.” Obama’s electrifying speech prompted television network commentators to predict a bright future for the forty-three-year-old keynoter, including possibly an eventual presidential candidacy.

The word “hope” also was threaded through John Edwards’s vice-presidential acceptance speech on July 28. The North Carolina senator urged the delegates to say “hope is on the way” to people at home who were despondent for a number of reasons, such as having a loved one fighting in Iraq. The presidential nomination roll call of the states was a foregone conclusion as most of Kerry's primary opponents, including Edwards, had released their delegates before the convention, giving the nominee a near unanimous tally. (Table, p. 749.)

On the convention's final night Kerry, saluting crisply at the beginning of his acceptance speech, said that he was "reporting for duty" as the party's candidate to unseat President Bush. Kerry's words touched off an immense cheer as the delegates seemed ready to support Kerry in challenging the adage that "you don't switch horses in midstream," especially in wartime.

The Massachusetts senator sought to counter Republican criticism that he might be weak on defense, in light of his opposition to the Vietnam War after serving in it as a patrol boat commander. "I defended this country as a young man and I will defend it as president," he said. "Let there be no mistake: I will never hesitate to use force when it is required. Any attack will be met with a swift and certain response. I will never give any nation or international institution a veto over our national security. And I will build a stronger American military. I will fight a smarter, more effective war on terror."

Kerry was joined on the platform by what he called "my band of brothers," men who served with him in Vietnam and were now supporting his candidacy. Among them was Jim Rassman, who credited Kerry with saving his life by pulling him from the river after he fell off the patrol boat. Former Georgia senator Max Cleland, who lost both legs and an arm in Vietnam, introduced Kerry.

The Democratic platform ran about 18,000 words and focused on national security and policies that benefited the middle class. Besides stem cell research, the platform also voiced support for preserving Social Security, maintaining abortion rights, and leaving the issue of same-sex marriage up to the states.

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 2004:

Defeating Terrorism. ... Today, the Bush Administration is waging a war against a global terrorist movement committed to our destruction with insufficient understanding of our enemy or effort to address the underlying factors that can give rise to new recruits. This war isn't just a manhunt. We cannot rest until Osama bin Laden is captured or killed, but that day will mark only a victory in the war on terror, not its end. Terrorists like al Qaeda and its affiliates are unlike any adversary our nation has ever known. We face a global terrorist movement of many groups, funded from different sources with separate agendas, but all committed to assaulting the United States and free and open societies around the globe. Despite his tough talk, President Bush's actions against terrorism have fallen far short. He still has no comprehensive strategy for victory. After allowing bin Laden to escape from our grasp at Tora Bora, he diverted crucial resources from the effort to destroy al Qaeda in Afghanistan. His doctrine of unilateral preemption has driven away our allies and cost us the support of other nations....

Iraq. ... More than a year ago, President Bush stood on an aircraft carrier under a banner that proclaimed "mission accomplished." But today we know that the mission is not finished, hostilities have not ended, and our men and women in uniform fight almost alone with the target squarely on their backs.

People of good will disagree about whether America should have gone to war in Iraq, but this much is clear: this Administration badly exaggerated its case, particularly with respect to weapons of mass destruction and the connection between Saddam's government and al Qaeda. This Administration did not build a true international coalition. This Administration disdained the United Nations weapons inspection process and rushed to war without exhausting diplomatic alternatives. Ignoring the advice of military leaders, this Administration did not send sufficient forces into Iraq to accomplish the mission. And this Administration went into Iraq without a plan to win the peace.

Now this Administration has been forced to change course in order to correct this fundamental mistake. They are now taking up the suggestions that many Democrats have been making for over a year. And they must—because having gone to war, we cannot afford to fail at peace. We cannot allow a failed state in Iraq that inevitably would become a haven for terrorists and a destabilizing force in the Middle East. And we must secure more help from an international community that shares a huge stake in helping Iraq become a responsible member of that community, not a breeding ground for terror and intolerance.

Strengthening Military. ... The Bush Administration was right to call for the "transformation" of the military. But their version of transformation neglected to consider that the dangers we face have also been transformed. The Administration was concerned with fighting classic conventional wars, instead of the asymmetrical threats we now face in Iraq, Afghanistan, and the war against al Qaeda. To rise to those challenges, we must strengthen our military, including our Special Forces, improve our technology, and task our National Guard with homeland security....

Homeland Security. The first and foremost responsibility of government is to protect its citizens from harm. Unfortunately, Washington today is not doing enough to make America safe.

We have made some progress since the terrible attacks of September 11th. We have taken steps to secure our airports. After resisting Democratic efforts for months, the Administration finally agreed to create the Department of Homeland Security....

Protecting Retirement Security. ... We are absolutely committed to preserving Social Security. It is a compact across the generations that has helped tens of millions of Americans live their retirement years in dignity instead of poverty. Democrats believe in the progressive, guaranteed benefit that has ensured that seniors and people with disabilities receive a benefit not subject to the whims of the market or the economy. We oppose privatizing Social Security or raising the retirement age. We oppose reducing the benefits earned by workers just because they have also earned a benefit from certain public retirement plans.

We will repeal discriminatory laws that penalize some retired workers and their families while allowing others to receive full benefits. Because the massive deficits under the Bush Administration have raided hundreds of billions of dollars from Social Security, the most important step we can take to strengthen Social Security is to restore fiscal responsibility. Social Security matters to all Americans, Democrats and Republicans, and strengthening Social Security should be a common cause.

Standing Up for the Middle Class. ... President Bush and the Republicans in Congress have ignored the middle class since day one of this Administration. They have catered to the wealth of the richest instead of honoring the work of the rest of us. They have promised almost everything and paid for almost nothing. And the middle class is shouldering more taxes, earning less money, and bearing higher costs....

First, we must restore our values to our tax code. We want a tax code that rewards work and creates wealth for more people, not a tax code that hoards wealth for those who already have it. With the middle class under assault like never before, we simply cannot afford the massive Bush tax cuts for the very wealthiest. We should set taxes for families making more than $200,000 a year at the same level as in the late 1990s, a period of great prosperity when the wealthiest Americans thrived without special treatment. We will cut taxes for 98 percent of Americans and help families meet the economic challenges of their everyday lives. And we will oppose tax increases on middle class families, including those living abroad.

Reforming Health Care. ... We oppose privatizing Medicare. We will not allow Republicans to destroy a commitment that has done so much good for so many seniors and people with disabilities over the past 39 years. Instead, we want to strengthen Medicare and make it more efficient.

We will ensure that seniors across the country, particularly in small-town and rural America, no longer suffer from geographic discrimination.

We will end the disgrace of seniors being forced to choose between meals and medication. Today, our seniors are paying too much for prescription drugs, while options abroad are far cheaper and just as safe. We will allow the safe reimportation of drugs from other countries.

Stem Cell Research. President Bush has rejected the calls from Nancy Reagan, Christopher Reeve and Americans across the land for assistance with embryonic stem cell research. We will reverse his wrongheaded policy. Stem cell therapy offers hope to more than 100 million Americans who have serious illnesses—from Alzheimer's to heart disease to juvenile diabetes to Parkinson's. We will pursue this research under the strictest ethical guidelines, but we will not walk away from the chance to save lives and reduce human suffering.

Voting Rights. Voting is the foundation of democracy, a central act of civic engagement, and an expression of equal citizenship. Voting rights are important precisely because they are protective of all other rights. We will call for legislative action that will fully protect and enforce the fundamental Constitutional right of every American to vote—to ensure that the Constitution's promise is fully realized and that, in disputed elections, every vote is counted fully and fairly....

A Strong American Community. We will extend the promise of citizenship to those still struggling for freedom. Today's immigration laws do not reflect our values or serve our security, and we will work for real reform.... Undocumented immigrants within our borders who clear a background check, work hard and pay taxes should have a path to earn full participation in America. We will hasten family reunification for parents and children, husbands and wives, and offer more English-language and civic education classes so immigrants can assume all the rights and responsibilities of citizenship. As we undertake these steps, we will work with our neighbors to strengthen our security so we are safer from those who would come here to harm us. We are a nation of immigrants, and from Arab-Americans in California to Latinos in Florida, we share the dream of a better life in the country we love.

We will defend the dignity of all Americans against those who would undermine it. Because we believe in the privacy and equality of women, we stand proudly for a woman's right to choose, consistent with Roe v. Wade, and regardless of her ability to pay. We stand firmly against Republican efforts to undermine that right. At the same time, we strongly support family planning and adoption incentives. Abortion should be safe, legal, and rare.

We support full inclusion of gay and lesbian families in the life of our nation and seek equal responsibilities, benefits, and protections for these families. In our country, marriage has been defined at the state level for 200 years, and we believe it should continue to be defined there. We repudiate President Bush's divisive effort to politicize the Constitution by pursuing a "Federal Marriage Amendment." Our goal is to bring Americans together, not drive them apart....

Diversity. ... We pledge to stand up for our beliefs and rally Americans to our cause. But we recognize that disagreements will remain, and we believe disagreement should not mean disrespect. Members of our party have deeply held and differing views on some matters of conscience and faith. We view diversity of views as a source of strength, and we welcome into our ranks all Americans who seek to build a stronger America. We are committed to resolving our differences in a spirit of civility, hope and mutual respect.

That's the America we believe in.

Republicans

For their convention held August 30 to September 2, the Republicans strategically chose New York, the city that lost the most lives and property in the 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States. The heavily secured convention site's proximity to lower Manhattan, where the World Trade Center towers fell, provided the delegates a constant reminder of President George W. Bush's finest hour: his calming leadership when the nation needed it most.

Clearly, the Republicans, in choosing New York City as their convention site for the first time, hoped to recapture the post–September 11 spirit and show that the feeling of unity had indeed "stayed that way." They wanted the public to remember it was a Republican president who had taken the nation safely past that dreadful day. They also sought to show that their party was best suited to protect Americans from future attacks.

One of the first speakers to address the Madison Square Garden convention in television prime time was former New York City mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who himself had won widespread praise for the city's response to the terrorist attack. He noted that shortly after September 11, 2001, the president had gone before Congress and "announced the Bush doctrine when he said: 'Our war on terror begins with Al Qaeda, but it doesn't end there. It will not end until every terrorist group of global reach has been found, stopped and defeated. Either you are with us or you are with the terrorists.'"

Another speaker on opening night was Sen. John McCain of Arizona, who had sought the party's presidential nomination in 2000. Defending his former rival's decision to invade Iraq, he said the choice "wasn't between a benign status quo and the bloodshed of war. It was between war and a graver threat." McCain singled out Michael Moore as a "disingenuous filmmaker" who had opposed that decision. Moore, sitting in the press section, had made Fahrenheit 9/11, a documentary sharply critical of the Iraq war. At the mention of Moore, the delegates booed and chanted, "Four More Years!"

Many of the 2,509 delegates and 2,344 alternates wore on their faces Band-Aids depicting the Purple Heart medal. They were mocking Kerry's three Purple Hearts for being wounded in Vietnam War action. After the Democratic convention in July, a group called Swift Boat Veterans for Truth began airing television ads accusing Kerry of lying to obtain medals for what they claimed were superficial wounds. McCain denounced the ads as "dishonest and dishonorable."

Addressing the convention on August 31, California governor Arnold Schwarzenegger told of listening to presidential candidates Richard Nixon and Hubert H. Humphrey, shortly after his arrival from Austria in 1968. Impressed with Nixon's views, he asked a friend who was translating for him whether Nixon was a Republican or a Democrat. When the friend replied "Republican," Schwarzenegger said, "'Then I'm a Republican,' and I've been one ever since. And, trust me, in my wife's family that is no small achievement." The delegates laughed, knowing his wife is Maria Shriver, a member of the Kennedy family of stalwart Democrats.

The Republicans scored a victory when they signed up conservative Democratic senator Zell Miller of Georgia to give the keynote address on September 1. "Motivated more by partisan politics than by national security, today's Democratic leaders see America as an occupier, not a liberator. Nothing makes this Marine madder than someone calling American troops invaders rather than liberators," Miller said. Angry with his party, he fumed that the "nation is being torn apart and made weaker because of the Democrats' manic obsession to bring down our commander in chief." Miller, a keynoter at the 1992 Democratic convention, was leaving the Senate in 2005.

Conspicuously missing from the speakers' rostrum was Nancy Reagan, widow of former president Ronald Reagan, who had died two months earlier. She reportedly had declined several invitations to speak because she objected to the party's use of her husband's words and images. She also disagreed with the administration's limits on funding for embryonic stem cell research to find cures for diseases such as Alzheimer's, which afflicted her husband.

As they did in 2000, the Republicans used a "rolling roll call" of the state delegations spanning three days for the formal renomination of President George W. Bush. In the final tally Bush received 2,508 votes with one abstention. Vice President Richard B. Cheney was renominated by acclamation. (Table, p. 748.)

In his acceptance speech on September 1, Cheney praised Bush's steady, determined leadership in time of war and doubted whether Kerry was up to the task. He pointed to the various defense measures that Kerry had opposed during his lengthy Senate career as a weakness in the critical area of national security. "A senator can be wrong for 20 years, without consequence to the nation. But a president—a president—always casts the deciding vote. And in this time of challenge, America needs—and America has—a president we can count on to get it right."

On September 2 President Bush delivered his nomination acceptance speech to an enthusiastic convention crowd. He defended the administration's decision to invade Iraq: "We must, and we will, confront threats to America before it is too late. In Saddam Hussein, we saw a threat." According to Bush, the decision to go to war was in keeping with what he called "the most solemn duty of the American president ... to protect the American people." For his domestic agenda, he promised to promote "an ownership society," where citizens "own their health care plans, and have the confidence of owning a piece of their retirement."

The Republican platform ran 42,000 words long and focused greatly on national security. The word "terror" or a variant, such as "terrorist," appeared almost 200 times. The platform also supported the tax cuts initiated during the president's first term, advocated drilling in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, and opposed abortion rights and same-sex marriage.

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 2004:

Iraq. As Republicans, we do not equivocate, as others have done, about whether America should have gone to war in Iraq. The best intelligence available at the time indicated that Saddam Hussein was a threat. On that point, President Bush, members of both parties in Congress, and the United Nations agreed. While the stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction we expected to find in Iraq have not yet materialized, we have confirmed that Saddam Hussein had the capability to reconstitute his weapons programs and the desire to do so. Our nation did the right thing, and the American people are now safer because we and our allies ended the brutal dictatorship of Saddam Hussein, halting his decades-long pursuit of chemical, biological, and nuclear weapons. President Bush had a choice to make: Trust a madman or defend America. He chose defending America.

War on Terror. We applaud President Bush for his success in mobilizing such international cooperation in the War on Terror, which the 9/11 Commission judges to be “on a vastly enlarged scale” and to have expanded dramatically since September 11, 2001. We also question the credibility of our opponents, who claim to support global alliances while nominating a candidate who has insulted our allies by calling the nations fighting in Iraq “window-dressing” and referring to them as a “coalition of the coerced and the bribed.” Directing ugly rhetoric at America’s allies in a time of war is irresponsible. It does not represent the gratitude and respect the vast majority of Americans have for the men and women from other nations who are risking their lives to make the world safer.

Private Retirement Accounts. Individual ownership of voluntary personal retirement accounts for today’s workers will make Social Security more equitable, but, just as importantly, will put the system on sure financial footing. Fifty years ago there were 16 workers to support every one beneficiary of Social Security. Today there are just 3.3 workers for each beneficiary. By the time young men and women who are entering the workforce today turn 65, there will be only two workers for each beneficiary. Doing nothing is not an option. We must keep faith with both the past and the future by strengthening and enhancing Social Security....

Lower Taxes and Economic Growth. In 2001, President Bush and the Republican Congress worked together to pass the most sweeping tax relief in a generation. By letting families, workers, and small business owners keep more of the money they earn, they helped bring America from recession to a steadily expanding economy. Despite enduring the after-effects of the stock market’s irrational exuberance in the late 1990s, terrorist attacks on our nation, and corporate scandals that bubbled to the surface after years of inattention, the U.S. economy has now grown for 33 straight months. And unlike four years ago, there are no signs of an end to the current economic growth.

Fiscal Discipline and Government Reform. It is important to view the size of the [federal] deficit in relation to the size of the nation’s economy. By that measure, today’s deficit, although unwelcome, is well within historical ranges. A deficit that is 3.8 percent of GDP [gross domestic product], as is now projected for this year, would be smaller than the deficits in nine of the last 25 years, and far below the peak deficit figure of 6 percent of GDP reached in 1983. This deficit is also in line with what other industrialized nations are facing today. The U.S. deficit matches the average deficit within the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and is below the levels of France, Germany, and Japan.

Much more importantly, because the President and Congress enacted pro-growth economic policies, the deficit is headed strongly in the right direction. Next year’s projected deficit, at 2.7 percent of GDP, would be smaller than those in 14 of the last 25 years. As Republicans in Congress work with the President to restrain spending and strengthen economic growth, the federal deficit will fall to 1.5 percent of the nation’s economic output in 2009—well below the 2.2 percent average of the last 40 years.

Corporate Responsibility. After fraudulent corporate practices rooted in the irrational exuberance of the late 1990s began to surface in the closing months of 2001, President Bush worked with the Congress to take decisive action to restore honesty and integrity to America’s corporate boardrooms. In July 2002, President Bush signed the Sarbanes-Oxley Act, the most far-reaching reform of American business practices since the 1940s. Under this new law, CEOs and Chief Financial Officers are required to personally vouch for the truth and fairness of their companies’ disclosures; for the first time, an independent board has been established to oversee the accounting profession; investigators have been given new tools to root out corporate fraud; and enhanced penalties are ensuring that dishonest corporate officials do hard time.

Reforming the Litigation System. America’s litigation system is broken. Junk and frivolous lawsuits are driving up the cost of doing business in America by forcing companies to pay excessive legal expenses to fight off or settle often baseless lawsuits. Those costs are being paid by small business owners, manufacturers, their employees, and consumers.... Trial lawyers get rich from the misfortune of others. If small business is America’s economic engine, trial lawyers are the brakes: They cost hundreds of thousands of good jobs, drive honest employers out of business, deprive women of critical medical care—then skip out with fat wallets and nary a thought for the economic havoc and human misery they leave in their wake.

Developing U.S. Oil Resources. Using the most sophisticated technologies, we can explore and develop oil resources here at home with minimal environmental impact. Our Party continues to support energy development in the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR), which, according to the U.S. Geological Survey, holds as much as 16 billion barrels of oil—enough to replace oil imports from Saudi Arabia for nearly 20 years....

Reforming the Medical Liability System. The medical liability system is harming our medical delivery system. Doctors are afraid to practice medicine. Frequent, unwarranted, lawsuits force doctors out of certain specialty areas and geographic regions.... Junk lawsuits add at least $60 billion to health care costs in America because doctors are forced to practice defensive medicine, ordering extensive, unnecessary, and expensive tests and procedures to keep trial lawyers at bay.

Faith-Based and Community Services. We applaud President Bush’s efforts to promote the generous and compassionate work of America’s faith-based and neighborhood charities. The President established the Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives in the White House to coordinate federal, state, and local efforts to tear down barriers that have prevented religiously affiliated groups from applying for government grants on an equal footing with secular organizations. While the federal government must not promote religious activity, advocate on behalf of any religion, or fund any organization that discriminates on the basis of religion when providing taxpayer-funded services, no organization should be disqualified from receiving federal funds simply because it displays religious symbols, has a statement of faith in its mission statement, or has a religious leader on its board.

Voting Rights. The foundation of our democratic republic is our commitment to conducting free and fair elections. Unfortunately, in November 2000, too many people believed they were denied the right to vote. Many African Americans, Hispanics, and others fear they may lose the right to vote because of inaccurate or insecure technology or because of a rolling back in the gains made by the passage of civil rights legislation. Our national commitment to a voting process that has integrity was underscored in 2002 when the Congress passed and the President signed the Help America Vote Act (HAVA). We will continue to do all we can to ensure that every lawful vote counts for all Americans.

Judiciary. In the federal courts, scores of judges with activist backgrounds in the hard-left now have lifetime tenure. Recent events have made it clear that these judges threaten America's dearest institutions and our very way of life. In some states, activist judges are redefining the institution of marriage. The Pledge of Allegiance has already been invalidated by the courts once, and the Supreme Court's ruling has left the Pledge in danger of being struck down again—not because the American people have rejected it and the values that it embodies, but because a handful of activist judges threaten to overturn commonsense and tradition. And while the vast majority of Americans support a ban on partial birth abortion, this brutal and violent practice will likely continue by judicial fiat. We believe that the self-proclaimed supremacy of these judicial activists is antithetical to the democratic ideals on which our nation was founded. President Bush has established a solid record of nominating only judges who have demonstrated respect for the Constitution and the democratic processes of our republic, and Republicans in the Senate have strongly supported those nominees. We call upon obstructionist Democrats in the Senate to abandon their unprecedented and highly irresponsible filibuster of President Bush's highly qualified judicial nominees, and to allow the Republican Party to restore respect for the law to America's courts.

Protecting Marriage. After more than two centuries of American jurisprudence, and millennia of human experience, a few judges and local authorities are presuming to change the most fundamental institution of civilization, the union of a man and a woman in marriage. Attempts to redefine marriage in a single state or city could have serious consequences throughout the country, and anything less than a Constitutional amendment, passed by the Congress and ratified by the states, is vulnerable to being overturned by activist judges.... President Bush will also vigorously defend the Defense of Marriage Act, which was supported by both parties and passed by 85 votes in the Senate. This common sense law reaffirms the right of states not to recognize same-sex marriages licensed in other states.

Defense of Life. We praise the President for his bold leadership in defense of life. We praise him for signing the Born Alive Infants Protection Act. This important legislation ensures that every infant born alive—including an infant who survives an abortion procedure—is considered a person under federal law.

We praise Republicans in Congress for passing, with strong bipartisan support, a ban on the inhumane procedure known as partial birth abortion. And we applaud President Bush for signing legislation outlawing partial birth abortion and for vigorously defending it in the courts....

PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES

Barack Obama
Democrat

John McCain
Republican

Democrats

After an intense primary season, Democrats convened August 25–28 at Denver’s Pepsi Center with hopes of regaining the White House after eight years of Republican rule. The primaries had narrowed the once-large field of contenders to two U.S. senators: Barack Obama of Illinois, an African American, and Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, wife of former president Bill Clinton. While Clinton won 300,000 more primary votes (including disputed ones from Michigan and Florida), Obama fared substantially better nationally in the primaries and caucuses and attracted more superdelegates. On June 3, the day of the last primaries, Obama gained enough delegates to push him over the top for the nomination.

Loyal supporters of Clinton, who had won more presidential primaries than any other woman, hoped that Obama would choose their candidate as his running mate. Instead, Obama chose another senator, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, who had withdrawn his presidential bid months earlier. The white-haired Biden brought thirty-five years of Senate experience to the ticket, including his current chairmanship of the Foreign Relations Committee.

While Obama, campaigning in Kansas City, did not attend the convention in person opening night in Denver, he opted instead to appear on a giant-screen TV behind his wife, Michelle, and their daughters, ten-year-old Malia and seven-year-old Sasha, who were on stage with microphones. “Hi, Daddy,” the smiling girls said to Obama, who told them that when they got to the White House they would get the puppy promised to them at the start of the campaign.

One of the convention’s opening speakers was Sen. Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts, who was recuperating from surgery for a brain tumor and had been rumored to be too sick to appear. Belying the rumors, Kennedy spoke vigorously in praise of Obama, saying: “This November the torch will be passed to a new generation of Americans, so with Barack Obama and for you and for me, our country will be committed to his cause. The work begins anew. The hope rises again. And the dream lives on.”

Michelle Obama also addressed the convention on opening night. She said, “Barack is running to end the war in Iraq responsibly, to build an economy that lifts every family, to make sure health care is available for every American, and to make sure every single child in this nation has a world-class education all the way from preschool to college. That’s what Barack Obama will do as president of the United States of America.”

Virginia’s governor, Mark R. Warner, gave the keynote speech, an honor Obama himself had received four years earlier—a distinction that propelled him into the spotlight as an up-and-coming leader in Democratic Party circles. He was then a relatively young forty-three years of age. Warner, too, benefited from the keynote attention. He subsequently was elected to succeed the state’s retiring senator, Republican John Warner (no relation).

In her widely anticipated speech, Clinton gave an enthusiastic endorsement of Obama. Earlier, in a concession speech, she said she had failed to break the legendary glass ceiling that excludes women from top jobs, including the presidency, but boasted that her primary vote total had at least “put 18 million cracks in it.”

Former president Bill Clinton, who was critical of Obama as a supporter of his wife during the bitter primary season, added himself to the list of Obama backers when he spoke to the convention. “In the end, my candidate didn’t win,” he said, adding, “Hillary told us in no uncertain terms that she’ll do everything she can to elect Barack Obama. That makes two of us. Actually, it makes 18 million of us because, like Hillary, I want all of you who supported her to vote for Barack Obama in November.”

Notably absent from the speakers’ podium was former president Jimmy Carter, who reportedly was not asked to speak because of his sympathies for the Palestinians in their struggles with Israel. Carter was present and was shown in a favorable short video. But he was limited to a walk across the stage with his wife, Roslyn. Carter later said it was his idea not to speak.

Susan Eisenhower, granddaughter of the late president Dwight D. Eisenhower, a Republican, spoke on behalf of Obama, saying that she did so not as a Republican or Democrat but “as an American.” She said she believed that Obama “has the energy and temperament to lead this country ... and mobilize a demoralized America and inspire all of us to show up for duty.”

Warm welcomes were shown to several other speakers, including former vice president Al Gore, a recent 2007 Nobel Peace Prize winner for his efforts to combat global warming; Sen. John F. Kerry, the party’s nominee in 2004; and Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, the convention chairwoman.

The 4,418 delegates began casting their nomination votes on Wednesday, August 27. When the roll call of the states reached the New York delegation, Senator Hillary Clinton moved to stop the voting and nominate Obama by acclamation. The motion carried. History had been made. For the first time, a major American political party had nominated an African American as its candidate for president. The nomination coincidentally occurred on the forty-fifth anniversary of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.’s “I Have a Dream” speech. (Table, p. 750.)

Emulating John F. Kennedy in 1960, Obama shifted the convention to a much larger venue for his nomination acceptance speech the last night of the convention. He moved it about a mile west to the outside Invesco Field stadium, Colorado’s largest. With additional temporary seating and standees, an estimated 84,000 people witnessed Obama’s speech, surpassing Kennedy’s 80,000 record.

The backdrop for Obama’s acceptance featured a curved blue stage with a dozen Doric style white columns flanked by two large television screens. Extending from center stage was a wide blue runway to the podium. Stadium lights floodlit the Obamas and their daughters as they walked hand-in-hand toward the podium, where Obama delivered his speech, ending with a quote from King’s “I Have a Dream” speech: “We cannot walk alone. And as we walk, we must make the pledge that we shall always march ahead. We cannot turn back.”

Following are excerpts from the Democratic platform of 2008:

Health Care. ... [We support] adoption of state-of-the-art health information technology systems, privacy-protected electronic medical records, reimbursement incentives, and an independent organization that reviews drugs, devices, and procedures to ensure that people get the right care at the right time.... We support increased funding into research, care and prevention of HIV/AIDS....

Retirement and Social Security. ... [We] will eliminate all federal income taxes for seniors making less than $50,000 per year.... We will fulfill our obligation to strengthen Social Security and to make sure that it provides guaranteed benefits Americans can count on, now and in future generations. We will not privatize it....

Good Jobs with Good Pay. We will strengthen the ability of workers to organize unions and fight to pass the Employee Free Choice Act....

Work and Family. We will expand the Family and Medical Leave Act to reach millions more workers than are currently covered, and we will enable workers to take leave to care for an elderly parent, address domestic violence and sexual assault, or attend a parent-teacher conference....

New American Energy. For the sake of our security—and for every American family that is paying the price at the pump—we will break our addiction to foreign oil.... [W]e Democrats commit to fast-track investment of billions of dollars over the next ten years to establish a green energy sector that will create up to five million jobs.... And we will call on businesses, government, and the American people to make America 50 percent more energy efficient by 2030....

A World Class Education for Every Child. The Democratic Party firmly believes that graduation from a quality public school and the opportunity to succeed in college must be the birthright of every child—not the privilege of the few.... We will fix the failures and broken promises of No Child Left Behind—while holding to the goal of providing every child access to a world-class education, raising standards, and ensuring accountability for closing the achievement gap....

Higher Education. ... We will make college affordable for all Americans by creating a new American Opportunity Tax Credit to ensure that the first $4,000 of a college education is completely free for most Americans. In exchange for the credit, students will be expected to perform community service....

Science, Technology, Innovation. ... We will make science, technology, engineering, and math education a national priority. We will double federal funding for basic research, invest in a strong and inspirational vision for space exploration, and make the Research and Development Tax Credit permanent.... We will lift the current Administration’s ban on using federal funding for embryonic stem cells....

Manufacturing. We will invest in American jobs and finally end the tax breaks that ship jobs overseas. We will create an Advanced Manufacturing Fund to provide for our next generation of innovators and job creators.... Our manufacturing communities need immediate relief. And we will help states and localities whose budgets are strained in times of need. We will modernize and expand Trade Adjustment Assistance....

Infrastructure. ... We will start a National Infrastructure Reinvestment Bank that can leverage private investment in infrastructure improvements, and create nearly two million new good jobs....

Tax Code Fairness. ... We will shut down the corporate loopholes and tax havens and use the money so that we can provide an immediate middle-class tax cut that will offer relief to workers and their families.... We will not increase taxes on any family earning under $250,000 and we will offer additional tax cuts for middle class families....

Housing. We will work to reform bankruptcy laws to restore balance between lender and homeowner rights.... We will pass a Homebuyers Bill of Rights, which will include establishing new lending standards to ensure that loans are affordable and fair, provide adequate remedies to make sure the standards are met, and ensure that homeowners have accurate and complete information about their mortgage options....

Consumer Protection. We will establish a Credit Card Bill of Rights to protect consumers and a Credit Card Rating System to improve disclosure....

Savings. ... We will create automatic workplace pensions. People can add to their pension, or can opt out at any time; the savings account will be easily transferred between jobs; and people can control it themselves if they become self-employed....

Trade Policies. We will not negotiate bilateral trade agreements that stop the government from protecting the environment, food safety, or the health of its citizens; give greater rights to foreign investors than to U.S. investors; require the privatization of our vital public services; or prevent developing country governments from adopting humanitarian licensing policies to improve access to life-saving medications....

Iraq. To renew American leadership in the world, we must first bring the Iraq war to a responsible end. Our men and women in uniform have performed admirably while sacrificing immeasurably.... We will re-center American foreign policy by responsibly redeploying our combat forces from Iraq and refocusing them on urgent missions. We will give our military a new mission: ending this war and giving Iraq back to its people. We will be as careful getting out of Iraq as we were careless getting in.... The central front in the war on terror is not Iraq, and it never was. We will defeat Al Qaeda in Afghanistan and Pakistan, where those who actually attacked us on 9-11 reside and are resurgent.

Afghanistan. Our troops are performing heroically in Afghanistan, but as countless military commanders and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff acknowledge, we lack the resources to finish the job because of our commitment to Iraq. We will finally make the fight against Al Qaeda and the Taliban the top priority that it should be....

Pakistan. The greatest threat to the security of the Afghan people—and the American people—lies in the tribal regions of Pakistan, where terrorists train, plot attacks, and strike into Afghanistan and move back across the border. We cannot tolerate a sanctuary for Al Qaeda. We need a stronger and sustained partnership between Afghanistan, Pakistan, and NATO—including necessary assets like satellites and predator drones—to better secure the border, to take out terrorist camps, and to crack down on cross-border insurgents....

Nuclear weapons. America will seek a world with no nuclear weapons.... We will work with other nations to secure, eliminate, and stop the spread of nuclear weapons and materials to dramatically reduce the dangers to our nation and the world.... We will seek deep, verifiable reductions in United States and Russian nuclear weapons and work with other nuclear powers to reduce global stockpiles dramatically.... The world must prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons. That starts with tougher sanctions and aggressive, principled, and direct high-level diplomacy, without preconditions.... We support the belated diplomatic effort to secure a verifiable end to North Korea's nuclear weapons program and to fully account for and secure any fissile material or weapons North Korea has produced to date....

The Americas. We believe that in the twenty-first century, the U.S. must treat Latin America and the Caribbean as full partners, just as our neighbors to the south should reject the bombast of authoritarian bullies. Our relationship with Canada, our long-time ally, should be strengthened and enhanced. An alliance of the Americas will only succeed if it is founded on the bedrock of mutual respect and works to advance democracy, opportunity, and security from the bottom up....

Middle East. It is in the best interests of all parties, including the United States, that we take an active role to help secure a lasting settlement of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict with a democratic, viable Palestinian state dedicated to living in peace and security side by side with the Jewish State of Israel....

Planet, Resources Stewardship. ... We will implement a market-based cap and trade system to reduce carbon emissions by the amount scientists say is necessary to avoid catastrophic change and we will set interim targets along the way to ensure that we meet our goal....

Firearms. We recognize that the right to bear arms is an important part of the American tradition, and we will preserve Americans' Second Amendment right to own and use firearms. We believe that the right to own firearms is subject to reasonable regulation....

Faith. We honor the central place of faith in our lives. Like our Founders, we believe that our nation, our communities, and our lives are made vastly stronger and richer by faith and the countless acts of justice and mercy it inspires.... Faith-based groups are not a replacement for government or secular non-profit programs; rather, they are yet another sector working to meet the challenges of the twenty-first century....

Seniors. We will protect and strengthen Medicare by cutting costs, protecting seniors from fraud, and fixing Medicare's prescription drug program. We will repeal the prohibition on negotiating prescription drug prices, ban drug companies from paying generic producers to refrain from entering drug markets, and eliminate drug company interference with generic competition—and we will dedicate all of the savings from these measures towards closing the donut hole....

Choice. The Democratic Party strongly and unequivocally supports Roe v. Wade and a woman's right to choose a safe and legal abortion, regardless of ability to pay, and we oppose any and all efforts to weaken or undermine that right. The Democratic Party also strongly supports access to comprehensive affordable family planning services and age-appropriate sex education which empower people to make informed choices and live healthy lives....

District of Columbia. Our civil rights leaders and many Americans of every background have sacrificed too much for us to tolerate continuing denial to the nearly 600,000 residents of our nation's capital of the benefits of full citizenship, especially the vote, that are accorded to citizens of every state....

Republicans

The Republicans held their 2008 convention September 1–4 in St. Paul, Minn., with the main stage of the Xcel Energy Center lower than usual, only about four feet above ground, to bring the speakers closer to the audience. Counting delegates, alternates, and guests, total attendance was about 45,000. With Sen. John McCain of Arizona as their nominee for president, the Republicans chose the theme “Country First,” echoing McCain’s emphasis on patriotism and military service during the primary campaign. (Table, p. 751.)

McCain had first campaigned for president in 2000, when he lost the nomination to George W. Bush. In 2008, with Bush leaving the national stage, McCain (one of the proponents of the McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform legislation) begun the primary season with strong name recognition among a large GOP field. Although he first lost in the Iowa caucuses, McCain won convincingly in the New Hampshire primary and he wrapped up the Republican nomination by March, three months before the Democrats settled their contest.

On the Friday before the convention, the day after the Democratic convention ended in Denver, McCain grabbed the headlines by introducing his surprise choice for vice president, Gov. Sarah Palin of Alaska. Palin, a former small-town mayor who had only been governor for two years, was the first woman ever to be on a national Republican ticket. Youthful at forty-three, Palin energized the party faithful, but because she was relatively unknown, she drew immediate and sharp media scrutiny.

The convention’s preliminary activities did not begin smoothly. Opening Monday night ceremonies were curtailed by Hurricane Gustav’s threat to the New Orleans area. Convention planners wanted to avoid appearing insensitive to the potential dangers facing an area the Bush administration had been accused of neglecting in the wake of Hurricane Katrina in 2005. President Bush also decided to forgo plans to address the convention in person on the first night. Instead, he spoke via television. Vice President Richard B. Cheney also cancelled his plan to visit the convention. As it turned out, the precautions were not needed. Hurricane Gustav fizzled out without much damage to the Gulf Coast.

An entirely different sort of bombshell, however, stirred up the convention Monday when it was disclosed that the Palins’ seventeen-year-old, unmarried daughter, Bristol, was pregnant and planned to marry the father, her boyfriend, Levi Johnston, at a later date. (Seven months after the convention and birth of her son, however, Bristol announced that she and Johnston had broken up.)

The convention got on track on the second night when Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut was a keynote speaker. Lieberman, the Democrats’ vice-presidential nominee in 2000, was elected as an Independent in 2006 after losing his party’s primary for reelection. A backer of the Bush-led war in Iraq, Lieberman threw his support to his long-time friend McCain, who also supported President Bush’s management of the war. Former senator and 2008 presidential candidate Fred Thompson of Tennessee shared the keynoter’s duties with Lieberman.

McCain’s ninety-seven-year-old mother, Roberta, made a warmly received appearance on stage. During the campaign, McCain had often cited his mother’s longevity to bolster his claim that at seventy-two he was not too old to be president.

Few African Americans were participants at the convention, but among them as a speaker was former Maryland lieutenant governor Michael Steele, who shortly afterward was elected chairman of the Republican National Committee. Other speakers included McCain’s top challengers in the primaries: former governor Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, former governor Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, and former New York mayor Rudolph “Rudy” Giuliani. All three enthusiastically supported their former rival. Other speakers included three Republican governors who were seen as rising stars for the party: Tim Pawlenty of Minnesota, Bobby Jindal of Louisiana, and Charlie Crist of Florida. These governors, along with former governor Tom Ridge of Pennsylvania, were reportedly among those considered by McCain for the vice-presidential spot.

For Palin’s acceptance speech Wednesday night, she was accompanied by her husband, Todd, and their five children: nineteen-year-old Track, Bristol, thirteen-year-old Willow, seven-year-old Piper, and four-month-old Trig.

In her acceptance speech, Palin defended her “outsider” status. “I’m not a member of the permanent political establishment,” she said. “And I’ve learned quickly, these past few days, that if you’re not a member in good standing of the Washington elite, then some in the media consider a candidate unqualified for that reason alone. But here’s a little news flash for all those reporters and commentators: I’m not going to Washington to seek their good opinion. I’m going to Washington to serve the people of this country. Americans expect us to go to Washington for the right reasons, and not just to mingle with the right people.”

Highly photogenic, Palin was enthusiastically received by the delegates. But if McCain minded being overshadowed temporarily, he didn't show it the next night during his acceptance speech. He could hardly contain his glee at the warm reception for Palin. He asked the delegates later, "How about Sarah Palin the other night? Wasn't she something? Eh? Eh?" The crowd roared its approval.

For McCain's speech, workers extended the podium runway about ten feet toward the audience, and McCain's wife, Cindy, introduced him.

In his acceptance, McCain spoke with feeling about his love of country. Referring to his five-and-a-half years as a prisoner during the Vietnam War, he said, "I fell in love with my country when I was a prisoner in someone else's. I loved it not just for the many comforts of life here. I loved it for its decency; for its faith in the wisdom, justice and goodness of its people. I loved it because it was not just a place, but an idea, a cause worth fighting for. I was never the same again. I wasn't my own man anymore. I was my country's."

Following are excerpts from the Republican platform of 2008:

Terrorism. The gravest threat we face—nuclear terrorism—demands a comprehensive strategy for reducing the world's nuclear stockpiles and preventing proliferation. The U.S. should lead that effort by reducing the size of our nuclear arsenal to the lowest number consistent with our security requirements and working with other nuclear powers to do the same....

Immigration. Border security is essential to national security. In an age of terrorism, drug cartels, and criminal gangs, allowing millions of unidentified persons to enter and remain in this country poses grave risks to the sovereignty of the United States and the security of its people. We simply must be able to track who is entering and leaving our country.... Immigrants should be encouraged to learn English....

International organizations. At the United Nations, our country will pay a fair, but not disproportionate, share of dues, but we will never support a UN-imposed tax. The UN must reform its scandal-ridden and corrupt management and become more accountable and transparent in its operations and expenses....

Because the UN has no mandate to promote radical social engineering, any effort to address global social problems must respect the fundamental institutions of marriage and family. We assert the rights of families in all international programs and will not fund organizations involved in abortion.... To shield the members of our Armed Forces and others in service to America from ideological prosecutions, the Republican Party does not accept the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court over Americans....

North Korea. ... The U.S. will not waver in its demand for the complete, verifiable, and irreversible dismantlement of North Korea's nuclear weapons programs, with a full accounting of its proliferation activities....

Israel. We reaffirm America's commitment to Israel's security and will ensure that Israel maintains a qualitative edge in military technology over any potential adversaries.... We support the vision of two democratic states living in peace and security: Israel, with Jerusalem as its capital, and Palestine. For that to become a reality, the Palestinian people must support leaders who reject terror, embrace the institutions and ethos of democracy, and respect the rule of law....

Iraq. A stable, unified, and democratic Iraqi nation is within reach. Our success in Iraq will deny al Qaeda a safe haven, limit Iranian influence in the Middle East, strengthen moderate forces there, and give us a strategic ally in the struggle against extremism. To those who have sacrificed so much, we owe the commitment that American forces will leave that country in victory and with honor....

Afghanistan. We must prevail in Afghanistan to prevent the reemergence of the Taliban or an al Qaeda sanctuary in that country. A nationwide counterinsurgency strategy led by a unified commander is an essential prerequisite to success. Additional forces are also necessary, both from NATO countries and through a doubling in size of the Afghan army....

Iran. As a rogue state, Iran's leadership supports terror, threatens its neighbors, and provides weapons that are killing our troops in Iraq. We affirm, in the plainest words we can use, that the U.S. government, in solidarity with the international community, will not allow the current regime in Tehran to develop nuclear weapons....

Spending. Because the problem is too much spending, not too few taxes, we support a supermajority requirement in both the House and Senate to guard against tax hikes....

Voting Rights. ... We support the right of states to require an official government-issued photo identification for voting and call upon the Department of Justice to deploy its resources to prevent ballot tampering in the November elections....

Taxes. The most important distinction between Republicans and the leadership of today's Democratic Party concerning taxes is not just that we believe you should keep more of what you earn.... We believe government should tax only to raise money for its essential functions. Today's Democratic Party views the tax code as a tool for social engineering.... The last thing Americans need right now is tax hikes....

Labor. We oppose "card check" legislation, which deprives workers of their privacy and their right to vote, because it exposes workers to intimidation by union organizers.

Homeownership. ... We support timely and carefully targeted aid to those hurt by the housing crisis so that affected individuals can have a chance to trade a burdensome mortgage for a manageable loan that reflects their home's market value. At the same time, government action must not implicitly encourage anyone to borrow more than they can afford to repay.... We do not support government bailouts of private institutions. Government interference in the markets exacerbates problems in the marketplace and causes the free market to take longer to correct itself....

Energy. Our current dependence on foreign fossil fuels threatens both our national security and our economy and could also force drastic changes in the way we live.... If we are to have the resources we need to achieve energy independence, we simply must draw more American oil from American soil. We support accelerated exploration, drilling and development in America, from new oilfields off the nation's coasts to onshore fields such as those in Montana, North Dakota, and Alaska....

Nuclear energy is the most reliable zero-carbon-emissions source of energy that we have. Unwarranted fear mongering with no relationship to current technologies and safeguards has prevented us from starting construction of a single nuclear power plant in thirty-one years....

We support coal-to-liquid and gasification initiatives, just as we support investment in the development and deployment of carbon capture and storage technologies, which can reduce emissions. We firmly oppose efforts by Democrats to block the construction of new coal-fired power plants. No strategy for reducing energy costs will be viable without a commitment to continued coal production and utilization....

Climate change. While the scope and long-term consequences of this are the subject of ongoing scientific research, common sense dictates that the United States should take measured and reasonable steps today to reduce any impact on the environment.... Republicans caution against the doomsday climate change scenarios peddled by the aficionados of centralized command-and-control government. We can—and should—address the risk of climate change based on sound science without succumbing to the no-growth radicalism that treats climate questions as dogma rather than as situations to be managed responsibly....

Health care. Republicans support the private practice of medicine and oppose socialized medicine in the form of a government-run universal health care system.... Radical restructuring of health care would be unwise. We want all Americans to be able to choose the best health care provider, hospital, and health coverage for their needs. We believe that real reform is about improving your access to a health care provider, your control over care, and your ability to afford that care....

[We] call for a major expansion of support for the stem-cell research that now shows amazing promise and offers the greatest hope for scores of diseases—with adult stem cells, umbilical cord blood, and cells reprogrammed into pluripotent stem cells—without the destruction of embryonic human life. We call for a ban on human cloning and for a ban on the creation of or experimentation on human embryos for research purposes....

Medicare, Medicaid. We support the provision of quality and accessible health care options for our nation's seniors and disabled individuals and recognize that in order to meet this goal we must confront the special challenges posed by the growth of Medicare costs.... Medicaid now accounts for 20 to 25 percent of state budgets and threatens to overwhelm state governments for the indefinite future. We can do better while spending less. A first step is to give Medicaid recipients more health care options. Several states have allowed beneficiaries to buy regular health insurance with their Medicaid dollars....

Education.... To ensure that all students will have access to the mainstream of American life, we support the English First approach and oppose divisive programs that limit students' future potential. All students must be literate in English, our common language, to participate in the promise of America....

Crime. We support mandatory sentencing provisions for gang conspiracy crimes, violent or sexual offenses against children, rape, and assaults resulting in serious bodily injury. Gang rape, child rape, and rape committed in the course of another felony deserve, at the least, mandatory life imprisonment. We oppose the granting of parole to dangerous or repeat felons. Courts must have the option of imposing the death penalty in capital murder cases and other instances of heinous crime, while federal review of those sentences should be streamlined to focus on claims of innocence and to prevent delaying tactics by defense attorneys....

Firearms. We uphold the right of individual Americans to own firearms, a right which antedated the Constitution and was solemnly confirmed by the Second Amendment....

Human Life. Faithful to the first guarantee of the Declaration of Independence, we assert the inherent dignity and sanctity of all human life and affirm that the unborn child has a fundamental individual right to life which cannot be infringed. We support a human life amendment to the Constitution, and we endorse legislation to make clear that the Fourteenth Amendment's protections apply to unborn children. We oppose using public revenues to promote or perform abortion and will not fund organizations which advocate it.... We must protect girls from exploitation and statutory rape through a parental notification requirement....

Marriage. Because our children's future is best preserved within the traditional understanding of marriage, we call for a constitutional amendment that fully protects marriage as a union of a man and a woman, so that judges cannot make other arrangements equivalent to it. In the absence of a national amendment, we support the right of the people of the various states to affirm traditional marriage through state initiatives....

Key Convention Ballots

THIS SECTION PRESENTS the results of important balloting from the presidential nominating conventions of three major American political parties (Whigs, Democrats, and Republicans) from 1835 to 2008. The balloting results are arranged in chronological order by convention year. Major contenders for the respective party nominations appear in the tables by last name only. Full names and other detailed descriptions of each convention can be found in Chapter 14, Convention Chronology. Each table contains a reference indicating the page where this information appears.

The source for the balloting results for the 1835–1972 conventions is Richard C. Bain and Judith H. Parris, Convention Decisions and Voting Records (Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution, 1973). Permission to use this material was granted by the Brookings Institution, which holds the copyright. The sources for the 1976 to 2008 vote totals are The Official Proceedings of the Democratic National Convention and the Republican National Committee. Convention Decisions and Voting Records contains ballots for three major parties in American history—the Democrats, the Whigs, and modern Republicans. This section includes ballots from conventions of these three parties alone.

In selecting ballots to include here, CQ Press editors followed several criteria:

- To include nominating ballots and selected other critical presidential ballots. The Democratic Party conventions of 1832, 1840, 1888, 1916, 1936, and 1964 nominated presidential candidates by acclamation without balloting. Midway through the balloting at the 2008 Democratic convention, one presidential candidate, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, requested that the delegates nominate her opponent, Barack Obama of Illinois, by acclamation.

- To include key ballots on important procedural issues, credentials contests, and platform disputes.
- To exclude all ballots for vice-presidential candidates.

Vote Total Discrepancies

Bain and Parris note frequent discrepancies between totals given in the published proceedings of the party conventions and the totals reached by adding up the state-by-state delegation votes. They state: “Wherever the discrepancy was obvious and the correct figure could be clearly derived, the record has been printed in corrected form. When the added totals of detailed figures listed differ from the sums printed in the proceedings, both totals are given.”

CQ Press editors have followed this same procedure. For example, on page 683, the forty-ninth presidential ballot of the 1852 Democratic Party convention appears. Franklin Pierce is listed as receiving 279 votes, the sum of the column. A footnote, however, indicates that the convention proceedings recorded Pierce as receiving 283 votes.

a. The sum of the column for Scott on the first ballot is 131 votes, for Fillmore on the 50th ballot 123 votes and for Scott on the 52nd ballot is 146 votes. The source for these discrepancies is the Baltimore Sun for June 19, 1852, and June 22, 1852. The Sun reported June 19, 1852, total votes for Scott on the first ballot as 132 votes; however, the column of figures for the state-by-state ballots reported in the Sun add up to 131 votes. Similarly, on June 22, 1852, the Sun reported 122 votes for Fillmore on the 50th ballot and 148 for Scott on the 52nd ballot, but the state-by-state ballots reported in the Sun add up to 123 votes and 146 votes, respectively. Bain's Convention Decisions and Voting Records used the Baltimore Sun as its source for the 1852 Whig convention ballots.

1. The vote was on a minority report by supporters of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy to overturn a proposed rule that would bind all delegates to vote on the first ballot for the presidential candidate under whose banner they were elected. A "yes" vote supported the Kennedy position while a "no" supported the Carter view that delegates should be bound.

2. Not voting, 1.

3. Other candidates: William Proxmire, 10 (Minnesota); Scott M. Matheson, 5 (Utah); Koryne Horbal, 5 (Minnesota); Ronald V. Dellums, 2.5 (2 in New York, 0.5 from Democrats Abroad); receiving 2 votes each: John C. Culver (Iowa); Warren Spannous (Minnesota); Alice Tripp (Minnesota); Kent Hance (Texas); Robert C. Byrd (West Virginia); receiving 1 vote each: Dale Bumpers (Arkansas); Edmund S. Muskie (Colorado); Walter F. Mondale (Minnesota); Hugh L. Carey (Oklahoma); Tom Steed (Oklahoma); Edmund G. Brown (Wisconsin); uncommitted, 10; not voting, 5; absent, 2.

4. Votes for other candidates remained the same except that Iowa switched its 2 votes for Culver to Carter. After the switches Carter was nominated by acclamation.

NOTE: Before delegates at the 2008 Democratic convention nominated Barack Obama of Illinois by acclamation, some states cast ballots. The motion to suspend the roll call and nominate Obama by acclamation was made by his principal opponent, Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, and came about in a carefully orchestrated manner. California and Illinois passed; when the voting reached New Mexico it yielded to Illinois, which in turn yielded to New York, allowing Clinton to make her motion. This table lists the first presidential balloting up to that point.

Popular Vote Returns for President

POPULAR VOTE RETURNS for all presidential elections from 1824 to 2008 are presented in this chapter. The presidential returns, except where indicated by a footnote, were obtained from three sources. The returns for 1824 to 1916 are from Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research (ICPSR) at the University of Michigan. The returns from 1920 to 1992 are from Richard M. Scammon and Alice V. McGillivray, America at the Polls (Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 1994). The returns for 1996 and 2008 are from the America Votes series, compiled biennially by Rhodes Cook for CQ Press. This base source material has been supplemented with data from elections historian Michael J. Dubin. CQ Press editors believed the additional data was of scholarly merit and worthy of inclusion—much of it filling the gaps or correcting errors in previous editions of Guide to U.S. Elections. Dubin's original sources are also listed in the footnotes. This new information first appeared in the fourth edition and has been carried forward to this edition.

The 1824 starting date for the ICPSR collection was based on factors such as the pronounced trend by 1824 for the election of presidential electors by popular vote, as well as the availability, accessibility, and quality of the returns. The bulk of the ICPSR election data collection consists of returns at the county level in computer-readable form.

Table Organization

For each presidential election from 1824 to 2008, the following information is provided in the tables for the popular returns:

- Names and party affiliations of major candidates.
- Total state-by-state popular vote for president.
- State-by-state breakdown of the popular vote and the percentage of the vote received by each candidate.
- The aggregate vote and percentage of the total vote received in each state by minor party candidates, minor parties running unpledged electors, or unidentified votes. These figures appear in the column designated “Other”; a breakdown of these votes appears at the end of chapter 16.

- The plurality received by the candidate who carried each state, along with the candidate's party designation.
- The total national popular vote for president, the total national popular vote and percentage of the vote received by each candidate, and the nationwide plurality of the candidate who received the greatest number of votes.

The omission of popular vote returns for a state after 1824 indicates an absence of popular voting for that election. The South Carolina legislature, for example, chose the state's presidential electors until 1860, and the state did not participate in the 1864 presidential election because of the Civil War. Thus, the first popular vote returns shown for South Carolina are for the 1868 election.

Party Designation

In many cases presidential candidates appeared on state ballots under different, even multiple party designations. Thus, in the returns for 1968, George C. Wallace ran for president under a variety of party designations in different states: Democratic, American, American Independent, Independent, George Wallace Party, Conservative, American Party of Missouri, Independent American, Courage, and George Wallace and Independent.

To provide one party designation for presidential candidates for the elections 1824 through 1916, CQ Press editors have aggregated under a single party designation the votes of candidates who are listed in the ICPSR data as receiving votes under more than one party designation. The source used for assigning party designation for these years is Svend Petersen, A Statistical History of the American Presidential Elections (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981). For the 1920 to 1992 elections, the source for party designation is Scammon and McGillivray, America at the Polls. For 1968 Scammon lists Wallace as an American Independent, and CQ Press follows this usage. For the 1996 to 2008 elections, the source for party designation is Cook, the America Votes series.

Vote Totals and Percentages

The total popular vote for each candidate in a given election was determined by adding the votes received by that candidate in each state (including write-in votes where available), even though the vote totals for some states may have come from sources other than ICPSR, Scammon, or Cook.

The percentages of the vote received in each state and nationally by any candidate or party has been calculated to two decimal places and rounded to one place; thus, 0.05 percent is listed as 0.1 percent. Due to rounding, state and national percentages do not always equal 100 percent.

Pluralities

The plurality column represents the differences between the vote received by the first- and second-place finishers in each state and in the nation. In most cases, most notably in 1912 and 1924, a losing major party candidate finished in third place in a state. In those few cases where votes from the “Other” column were needed to calculate the plurality, a footnote provides an explanation. For a breakdown of “Other” votes, see Popular Returns: Minor Candidates and Parties at the end of this chapter.

1. For breakdown of "Other" vote, see minor candidate vote totals at the end of this chapter.

2. Figures from W. Dean Burnham, Presidential Ballots 1836–1892 (New York: Arno Press, 1976).

3. According to Burnham there were two Democratic slates—regular with 96,594 votes and Readjuster Democrats with 32,053 votes—and he does not combine the two. They are combined here. It is not entirely clear if they ran the same set of electors.

1. Bryan was nominated by both the Democrats and the Populists but with different running mates. In several states different slates of electors were entered by each party. It is legally incorrect to combine the vote. The separate vote for Bryan usually under the Populist ticket is listed under "Other." In other states it appears that the two slates of electors were the same and it is correct to combine the vote.

2. For breakdown of "Other" vote, see minor candidate vote totals at the end of this chapter.

3. Figures from Edgar E. Robinson, The Presidential Vote 1896–1932 (Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1934).

4. The vote of Kent County was excluded from the official tally because two sets of returns were sent to the state. The vote of the county as reported would have made the vote: McKinley, 20,685; Bryan, 16,708; Palmer, 968; and Levering, 469.

5. Figures from Svend Petersen, A Statistical History of the American Presidential Elections (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981).

6. Figures from Political History of Nevada (Secretary of State).

7. Figures from Manual, 1897.

8. There were two separate Bryan slates in Texas with various sources offering widely different totals. Figures here are from Robinson, The Presidential Vote, supplemented with manuscript returns supplied by the Texas secretary of state.

9. Figures from Vermont Legislative Directory.

Presidential Popular Vote Returns: Minor Candidates and Parties, 1824–2008

This section contains popular vote returns for minor candidates and parties that were aggregated in the columns labeled “Other” in the presidential election returns in this chapter. The source for these data for 1824–1916, except where indicated by a footnote, is the Inter-University Consortium for Political and Social Research (ICPSR). (See box, ICPSR Historical Election Returns File, p. xviii.) For the 1920 to 1992 elections, the source is Richard M. Scammon and Alice V. McGillivray, America at the Polls (Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 1994). For the 1996 to 2008 elections, the source is the America Votes series, compiled biennially by Rhodes Cook for CQ Press in Washington, D.C.

CQ Press editors have supplemented the base source material with additional research provided by elections historian Michael J. Dubin. This additional material first appeared in the fourth edition of the Guide and is carried forward in this edition. For the state returns marked with an asterisk (*), the sources for the revised data are found in the footnotes to the same states in the corresponding presidential election table found earlier in this chapter.

The material in this section is presented in the following order:

- Year of presidential election.
- Name of candidate and party, if available from the ICPSR, Scammon, and Cook data, or from other sources considered reliable. “Scattered write-ins” is used where votes were recorded but neither the candidate nor a party was known. In most cases, these figures were the total write-in vote.

- State name and number of votes. Percentages may be calculated by using the state vote totals from the presidential election tables found in this chapter.
- Nationwide vote totals. Percentages may be calculated by using the national vote total from the presidential election tables.

In the ICPSR data, the distinct party designations appearing in the original sources are preserved. Thus, in the ICPSR returns for 1880, John W. Phelps received votes under the following four party designations: “Anti-Masonic”—California, 5 votes, Illinois, 150 votes, and Pennsylvania, 44 votes; “Anti-Secret”—Kansas, 25 votes; “National American”—Michigan, 312 votes; and “American”—Rhode Island, 4 votes, and Wisconsin, 91 votes.

To provide one party designation for each minor candidate for the elections 1824 to 1916, CQ Press has aggregated under a single party designation the votes of minor candidates who are listed in the ICPSR data as receiving votes under more than one party designation. The source used for assigning party designations for these years is Svend Petersen, A Statistical History of the American Presidential Elections (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981) where Petersen gives a party designation. In the 1880 election cited above, Peterson lists John W. Phelps as an American Party candidate. Where Petersen lists no party designation, CQ Press selected the party designation for a candidate that appeared most frequently in the ICPSR returns. For the 1920 to 1992 elections, the source for party designations is Scammon and McGillivray, America at the Polls. For the 1996 to 2008 elections, the source is Cook, America Votes.

2. Troup figures obtained from Petersen, A Statistical History, 31.

3. Iowa and Mississippi figures from Petersen, A Statistical History, 81. Petersen lists these votes, as well as Progressive votes in all other states, for Theodore Roosevelt. In the ICPSR data for 1916, votes are listed for Progressive electors; Roosevelt's name does not appear. Since Roosevelt declined to be a candidate, Congressional Quarterly followed ICPSR in listing these votes as Progressive.

4. MacArthur ran under a variety of party designations: Christian Nationalist in Arkansas, New Mexico, Tennessee, North Dakota, and Washington; Christian Nationalist—Constitution in California and Texas; Constitution in Colorado; and Christian Nationalist—America First in Missouri.

5. L. Neil Smith ran as the Libertarian Party's presidential candidate in Arizona only. Harry Browne ran as the party's candidate in the other forty-nine states.

The Electoral College

FOR MORE THAN TWO CENTURIES, Americans have been electing their presidents through the electoral college. Created by the Framers of the Constitution as a compromise between selection by Congress and election by direct popular vote, the system has continued to function even though the United States has undergone radical transformation from an agricultural seaboard nation to a world power.

But despite its durability, the electoral college is perhaps the least cherished of the nation's venerable political institutions. Thomas Jefferson called it "the most dangerous blot on our Constitution," and people have been calling for its abolition or reform ever since.

Under the electoral college system, each state is entitled to electoral votes equal in number to its congressional delegation—that is, the number of representatives from the state, plus two for the state's two senators. (The District of Columbia has three electoral votes, the number it would have if it were a state, making the total electoral college membership 538.) As it works today, the electoral college is largely a "winner-take-all" system. The party that receives a plurality of a state's popular vote is virtually assured of receiving all of that state's electoral votes. Exceptions are Maine and Nebraska, where two electoral votes are awarded to the statewide winner and the others are allocated by presidential election districts that match the states' congressional districts (two in Maine and three in Nebraska). Before 2008 neither state ever split its vote. But in the 2008 presidential election, while Republican John McCain swept most of Nebraska, Democrat Barack Obama won the majority in the congressional district around Omaha, which gave him one of the state's five electoral votes. In the past there were even more variations of today's procedure, including choosing electors by congressional district, voting statewide for each individual elector, and selection of electors by state legislatures. There also have been several cases of a so-called faithless elector, who cast his or her electoral vote for a candidate other than the one who won the popular vote in the elector's state. (See box, Splitting of States' Electoral Votes, p. 818.)

Critics call the electoral college anachronistic and anti-democratic. Many believe that direct election is fairer and more likely to express the will of the people. Public opinion polls consistently show that most Americans favor switching to direct popular vote. Supporters, however, view the college as a bulwark of federalism and the two-party system. They note that most of the time it works flawlessly. They maintain that the system forces a winning candidate to build a national coalition covering many states, which usually enables the president to govern from a wide base even if the popular vote margin of victory is close. Only four times has the popular vote winner not won the presidency.

CONSTITUTIONAL BACKGROUND

The method of selecting a president was the subject of long debate at the Constitutional Convention of 1787. Several plans were proposed and rejected before a compromise solution, which was modified only slightly in later years, was adopted (Article II, Section I, Clause 2).

Facing the convention when it opened May 25 was the question of whether the chief executive should be chosen by direct popular election, by the Congress, by state legislatures, or by intermediate electors. Direct election was opposed because it was felt generally that the people lacked sufficient knowledge of the character and qualifications of possible candidates to make an intelligent choice. Many delegates also feared that the people of the various states would be unlikely to agree on a single person, usually casting their votes for favorite-son candidates well known to them.

The possibility of giving Congress the power to choose the president also received consideration. This plan was rejected, however, largely because of fear that it would jeopardize the principle of executive independence. Similarly, a plan favored by many delegates, to let state legislatures choose the president, was turned down because the delegates thought the president might feel so indebted to the states as to allow them to encroach on federal authority.

Unable to agree on a plan, the convention appointed a "Committee of Eleven" on August 31 to solve the problem.

SPLITTING OF STATES' ELECTORAL VOTES: FACTIONALISM AND "FAITHLESS ELECTORS"

Throughout the history of presidential elections, there have been numerous instances when the U.S. electoral votes from an individual state have been divided among two or more candidates. These cases of split electoral votes occurred for a variety of reasons.

ELECTORAL VOTE SPLITS, 1789–1836

Splits of a state's electoral votes cast for president before 1836 occurred for these reasons:

- For the first four presidential elections (1789–1800) held under Article II, Section 1 of the Constitution, each elector cast two votes without designating which vote was for president and which for vice president. As a result, electoral votes for each state were often scattered among several candidates. The Twelfth Amendment, ratified in 1804, required electors to vote separately for president and vice president.
- The district system of choosing electors, in which different candidates each could carry several districts, is the explanation for the split electoral votes in Maryland in 1804, 1808, 1812, 1824, 1828, and 1832; North Carolina in 1808; Illinois in 1824; Maine in 1828; and New York in 1828.
- The selection of electors by the legislatures of some states sometimes led to party factionalism or political deals that resulted in the choice of electors loyal to more than one presidential candidate. This was the cause for the division of electoral votes in New York in 1808 and 1824; Delaware in 1824; and Louisiana in 1824.
- The vote of an individual elector for someone other than his party's candidate occurred in New Hampshire in 1820, when one Democratic-Republican elector voted for John Quincy Adams instead of the party nominee, James Monroe, to preserve George Washington's distinction as the only unanimously elected president. Three other electors did not vote in 1820.

VOTING FOR INDIVIDUAL ELECTORS

By 1836 all states except South Carolina, which selected its electors by the state legislature until after the Civil War, had established a system of statewide popular election of electors. The new system limited the frequency of electoral vote splits.

On September 4 it suggested a compromise under which each state would appoint presidential electors equal to the total number of its representatives and senators. The electors, chosen in a manner set forth by each state legislature, would meet in their respective states and each cast votes for two persons. The votes would be counted in Congress, with the candidate receiving a majority elected president and the second-highest candidate becoming vice president.

No distinction was made between ballots for president and vice president. Moreover, the development of national political parties, which was not anticipated at that time, and

Nevertheless, a few states on occasion still divided their electoral votes among different presidential candidates. This occurred because of the practice of listing on the ballot the names of all electors and allowing voters to cross off the names of any particular electors they did not like, or, alternatively, requiring voters to vote for each individual elector. In a close election, electors of different parties sometimes were chosen. An example occurred in California in 1880 when one of the state's electoral votes went to Republican James A. Garfield, although the Democrat Winfield S. Hancock won the state's popular vote by 144 votes. One Democratic elector on the California ballot ran behind a Republican, as shown in this tally of electors:

Winning votes	Elector's party	Losing votes	Elector's party
80,443	Democratic	80,282	Republican
80,443	Democratic	80,282	Republican
80,426	Democratic	80,252	Republican
80,420	Democratic	80,242	Republican
80,413	Democratic	80,228	Republican
80,348	Republican	79,885	Democratic

- New Jersey, 1860. Four Republican and three Douglas Democratic electors won.
- California, 1892. Eight Democratic electors and one Republican won.
- North Dakota, 1892. Two Fusionists (Democrats and Populists) and one Republican won. One of the Fusion electors voted for Democrat Grover Cleveland, and the other voted for Populist James B. Weaver, while the Republican elector voted for Benjamin Harrison, thus splitting the state's electoral vote three ways.
- Ohio, 1892. Twenty-two Republicans and one Democratic elector won.
- Oregon, 1892. Three Republicans and one Populist with Democratic support won.
- California, 1896. Eight Republicans and one Democratic elector won.
- Kentucky, 1896. Twelve Republicans and one Democratic elector won.

the nomination of tickets for president and vice president created further confusion in the electoral system. All the electors of one party tended to cast ballots for their two party nominees. But with no distinction between the presidential and vice-presidential nominees, the danger arose of a tie vote between the two. That actually happened in 1800, leading to a change in the original electoral system with ratification of the Twelfth Amendment in 1804.

The committee's compromise plan constituted a great concession to the less populous states, because it ensured them a minimum of three votes (two for their two senators

- Maryland, 1904. Seven Democratic electors and one Republican won.
- Maryland, 1908. Six Democratic and two Republican electors won.
- California, 1912. Eleven Progressive and two Democratic electors won.
- West Virginia, 1916. Seven Republicans and one Democratic elector won.

The increasing use of voting machines and straight-ticket voting—where the pull of a lever or the marking of an “X” results in automatically casting a vote for every elector—led to the decline in split electoral votes.

“FAITHLESS ELECTORS”

Yet another cause for occasional splits in a state’s electoral vote is the so-called faithless elector. By 2008, according to the Congressional Research Service, twenty-seven states including the District of Columbia had laws requiring electors to vote for the state’s popular vote winner. These states were Alabama, Alaska, California, Colorado, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Florida, Hawaii, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Carolina, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

In Michigan and North Carolina a “faithless elector” was not to be counted, with the remaining electors filling the vacancy. New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, and Washington provided criminal penalties or fines for violations. However, no faithless elector has ever been punished and experts doubt that it would be constitutionally possible to do so.

In reality, electors are almost always faithful to the candidate of the party with which they are affiliated, law or no law. But at times in U.S. political history, electors have broken ranks to vote for candidates not supported by their parties. In 1796 a Pennsylvania Federalist elector voted for Democratic-Republican Thomas Jefferson instead of Federalist John Adams. Some historians and political scientists claim that three Democratic-Republican electors voted for Adams. However, the fluidity of political party lines at that early date and the well-known personal friendship between Adams and at least one of the electors make the claim of their being faithless electors one of continuing controversy. In 1820 a New Hampshire Democratic-Republican elector voted for John Quincy Adams instead of the party nominee, James Monroe.

and at least one for their representative), however small their populations might be. The plan also left important powers with the states by giving complete discretion to state legislatures to determine the method of choosing electors.

The only part of the committee’s plan that aroused serious opposition was a provision giving the Senate the right to decide presidential elections in which no candidate received a majority of electoral votes. Some delegates feared that the Senate, which already had been given treaty ratification powers and the responsibility to “advise and consent” on all important executive appointments, might become too

There was no further occurrence until 1948, when Preston Parks, a Truman elector in Tennessee, voted for Gov. J. Strom Thurmond of South Carolina, the States Rights Democratic Party (Dixiecrat) presidential nominee. Since then, there have been the following instances:

- In 1956 W. F. Turner, a Stevenson elector in Alabama, voted for a local judge, Walter B. Jones.
- In 1960 Henry D. Irwin, a Nixon elector in Oklahoma, voted for Sen. Harry F. Byrd, a Virginia Democrat.
- In 1968 Lloyd W. Bailey, a Nixon elector in North Carolina, voted for George C. Wallace, the American Independent Party candidate.
- In 1972 Roger L. MacBride, a Nixon elector in Virginia, voted for John Hospers, the Libertarian Party candidate.
- In 1976 Mike Padden, a Ford elector in the state of Washington, voted for former governor Ronald Reagan of California.
- In 1988 Margaret Leach, a Dukakis elector in West Virginia, voted for Dukakis’s running mate, Sen. Lloyd Bentsen of Texas.
- In 2000 Barbara Lett-Simmons, a Gore elector in Washington, D.C., withheld her vote from Gore.
- In 2004 an anonymous Kerry elector in Minnesota voted for Kerry’s running mate, Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

VOTES FROM CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICTS

In 2008 Nebraska split its five electoral votes, with four going to Sen. John McCain and one to Sen. Barack Obama. Nebraska is one of two states (Maine is the other) that splits its electoral vote between congressional districts. The winner of each district receives that district’s vote. The statewide winner receives the state’s other two electoral votes. Nebraska has used this system since 1996 and Maine since 1972. The 2008 election was the first time that a split electoral vote occurred in either state. All other states use the winner-take-all method in which the candidate who wins the statewide vote gets all the state’s electoral votes.

powerful. A proposal was made and accepted to let the House of Representatives decide the winner in instances when the electors failed to give a majority of their votes to a single candidate. The interests of the small states were preserved by giving each state’s delegation only one vote in the House on roll calls to elect a president.

The system adopted by the Constitutional Convention was a compromise born out of problems involved in diverse state voting requirements, the slavery problem, big-state versus small-state rivalries, and the complexities of the balance of power among different branches of the government.

Moreover, it was probably as close to a direct popular election as the men who wrote the Constitution thought possible and appropriate at the time.

The term electoral college itself does not appear in the Constitution. It was first used unofficially in the early 1800s and became the official designation for the electoral body in 1845.

The Twelfth Amendment

Only once since ratification of the Constitution has an amendment been adopted that substantially altered the method of electing the president. In the 1800 presidential election, the Democratic-Republican electors inadvertently caused a tie in the electoral college by casting equal numbers of votes for Thomas Jefferson, whom they wished to be elected president, and Aaron Burr, whom they wished to elect vice president. The election was thrown into the House, and thirty-six ballots were required before Jefferson was finally elected president. The Twelfth Amendment, ratified in 1804, sought to prevent a recurrence of this incident by providing that the electors should vote separately for president and vice president. (See “Constitutional Provisions and Amendments on Elections,” p. 1735, in Reference Materials, Vol. II.)

Other changes in the system evolved over the years. The authors of the Constitution, for example, had intended that each state should choose its most distinguished citizens as electors and that they would deliberate and vote as individuals in electing the president. But as strong political parties began to appear, the electors came to be chosen merely as representatives of the parties; independent voting by electors disappeared almost entirely.

METHODS OF CHOOSING ELECTORS

In the early years of the Republic, states used a variety of methods to select presidential electors. For the first presidential election, in 1789, four states held direct popular elections to choose their electors: Pennsylvania and Maryland (at large) as well as Virginia and Delaware (by district). In five states—Connecticut, Georgia, New Jersey, New York, and South Carolina—the state legislatures were to make the choice.

New Hampshire and Massachusetts adopted a combination of the legislative and popular methods. New Hampshire held a statewide popular vote for presidential electors with the stipulation that any elector would have to win a majority of the popular vote to be elected; otherwise, the legislature would choose. In Massachusetts the arrangement was for the voters in each congressional district to vote for the two persons they wanted to be presidential electors. From the two individuals in each district receiving the highest number of votes, the legislature, by joint ballot of both houses, was to choose one. In addition, the legislature was to choose two electors at large.

Because of a dispute between the two chambers, the New York Legislature failed to choose electors. The state Senate insisted on full equality with the Assembly (lower house); that is, the Senate wanted each house to take a separate ballot and to resolve any differences between them by agreement rather than by having one house impose its will on the other. The Assembly, on the other hand, wanted a joint ballot, on which the lower house's larger numbers would prevail, or it was willing to divide the electors with the Senate. The failure to compromise cost the state its vote in the first presidential election.

The twelfth and thirteenth states—North Carolina and Rhode Island—had not ratified the Constitution by the time the electors were chosen, so they did not participate in the 1789 election.

Generally similar arrangements prevailed for the election of 1792. Massachusetts, while continuing to choose electors by district, changed the system somewhat to provide for automatic election of any candidate for elector who received a majority of the popular vote. New Hampshire continued the system of popular election at large, but substituted a popular runoff election in place of legislative choice, if no candidate received a majority of the popular vote.

Besides Massachusetts and New Hampshire, electors were chosen in 1792 by popular vote in Maryland and Pennsylvania (at large) and Virginia and Kentucky (by district). State legislatures chose electors in Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Vermont.

By 1796 several changes had occurred. New Hampshire switched back to legislative choice for those electors who failed to receive a majority of the popular vote. Tennessee entered the Union (1796) with a unique system for choosing presidential electors: the state legislature appointed three persons in each county, who in turn chose the presidential electors. Massachusetts retained the system used in 1792. Other states chose their electors as follows: at-large popular vote: Georgia and Pennsylvania; district popular vote: Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, and Virginia; state legislature: Connecticut, Delaware, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Vermont.

Political Parties and Electors: 1800

As political parties gained power, manipulation of the system of choosing electors became increasingly widespread. For example, in 1800 Massachusetts switched from popular voting to legislative selection of electors because of recent successes by the Democratic-Republican Party in that state. The Federalists, still in firm control of the legislature, sought to secure the state's entire electoral vote for its presidential candidate, native son John Adams. New Hampshire did likewise.

The rival Democratic-Republicans were not innocent of this kind of political maneuver. In Virginia, where that party was in control, the legislature changed the system for choosing electors from districts to a statewide at-large ballot. That way, the expected statewide Democratic-Republican majority could overcome Federalist control in some districts and garner a unanimous vote for Jefferson, the Democratic-Republican presidential candidate.

In Pennsylvania the two houses of the state legislature could not agree on legislation providing for popular ballots, the system used in the first three elections, so the legislature itself chose the electors, dividing them between the parties.

In other changes in 1800, Rhode Island switched to popular election and Georgia reverted to legislative elections. The sixteen states used the following methods of choosing presidential electors in 1800:

- By popular vote: Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina (by district); Rhode Island, and Virginia (at large).
- By the legislature: Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee (indirectly, as in 1796), and Vermont.

Trend to Winner-Take-All System

For the next third of a century, the states moved gradually toward a standard system of choosing presidential electors—the statewide, winner-take-all popular ballot. The development of political parties resulted in the adoption of slates of electors pledged to vote for the parties' presidential candidates. Each party organization saw a statewide ballot as being in its best interest, with the hope of sweeping in all its electors and preventing the opposition group from capitalizing on local areas of strength (which could result in winning only part of the electoral vote under the districting system).

From 1804 to 1832 the states used three basic methods of choosing presidential electors—at-large popular vote, district popular vote, and election by the state legislature. The following list shows the changing methods of choosing presidential electors for each state from 1804 to 1832:

1804

Popular vote, at large: New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Virginia.

Popular vote, by district: Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Tennessee.

State legislature: Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, New York, South Carolina, and Vermont.

1808

Popular vote, at large: New Hampshire, New Jersey, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Virginia.

Popular vote, by district: Kentucky, Maryland, North Carolina, and Tennessee.

State legislature: Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Massachusetts, New York, South Carolina, and Vermont.

1812

Popular vote, at large: New Hampshire, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Virginia.

Popular vote, by district: Kentucky, Maryland, Massachusetts, and Tennessee.

State legislature: Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Vermont.

1816

Popular vote, at large: New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Virginia.

Popular vote, by district: Kentucky, Maryland, and Tennessee.

State legislature: Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, Massachusetts, New York, South Carolina, and Vermont.

1820

Popular vote, at large: Connecticut, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Virginia.

Popular vote, by district: Illinois, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, and Tennessee.

State legislature: Alabama, Delaware, Georgia, Indiana, Louisiana, Missouri, New York, South Carolina, and Vermont.

1824

Popular vote, at large: Alabama, Connecticut, Indiana, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Virginia.

Popular vote, by district: Illinois, Kentucky, Maine, Maryland, Missouri, and Tennessee.

State legislature: Delaware, Georgia, Louisiana, New York, South Carolina, and Vermont.

1828

Popular vote, at large: Alabama, Connecticut, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Mississippi, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Virginia.

Popular vote, by district: Maine, Maryland, New York, and Tennessee.

State legislature: Delaware, and South Carolina.

1832

Popular vote, at large: All states except Maryland and South Carolina.

Popular vote, by district: Maryland.

State legislature: South Carolina.

By 1836 Maryland switched to the system of choosing its electors by statewide popular vote. This left only South Carolina selecting its electors through the state legislature. The state continued this practice through the election of 1860. Only after the Civil War was popular voting for presidential electors instituted in South Carolina.

Since 1836 the statewide, winner-take-all popular vote for electors has been the almost universal practice. Exceptions include the following:

- Massachusetts, 1848. Three slates of electors ran—Whig, Democratic, and Free Soil—none of which received a majority of the popular vote. Under the law then in force, the state legislature was to choose in such a case. It chose the Whig electors.
- Florida, 1868. The state legislature chose the electors.
- Colorado, 1876. The state legislature chose the electors because the state had just been admitted to the Union, had held state elections in August, and did not want to go to the trouble and expense of holding a popular vote for the presidential election so soon thereafter.
- Michigan, 1892. Republicans had been predominant in the state since the 1850s. However, in 1890 the Democrats gained control of the legislature and the governorship and enacted a districting system of choosing presidential electors in the expectation that the Democrats could carry some districts and thus some electoral votes in 1892. They were correct; the Republicans won nine and the Democrats five electoral votes that year. But the Republicans soon regained control of the state and reenacted the at-large system for the 1896 election.
- Maine, 1972. In 1969 the Maine legislature enacted a district system for choosing presidential electors. Two of the state's four electors were selected on the basis of the statewide vote, and the other two were determined according to which party carried each of the state's two congressional districts. The system is still in force. Although the district system allowed splitting electoral votes, from its inception through 2008 the system had not produced a split vote in Maine.
- Nebraska, 1992. Nebraska, with five electoral votes, adopted an allocation system similar to Maine's. Like Maine, Nebraska did not split its electoral votes under the new system through the 2004 presidential election. In 2008, however, one district and therefore one electoral vote went to Obama with the remaining four to McCain.
- Florida, 2000. The Republican-controlled legislature met in special session to choose the state's twenty-five electors. The action ensured that Florida's electoral votes would not be disqualified if the winner of the state's popular vote had not been determined by the federal date for counting electoral votes. Florida is one of twenty-seven states that bind electors to the popular vote winner, but the constitutionality of such laws has not been tested.

- Colorado, 2004. Voters soundly defeated a ballot measure that would have allocated the state's nine electoral votes to presidential candidates in proportion to their share of the total votes cast for president in the state. The Republican administration of Gov. Bill Owens opposed the amendment.

HISTORICAL ANOMALIES

The complicated and indirect system of electing the president has led to anomalies from time to time. In 1836, for example, the Whigs sought to take advantage of the electoral system by running different presidential candidates in different parts of the country. William Henry Harrison ran in most of New England, the mid-Atlantic states, and the Midwest; Daniel Webster ran in Massachusetts; and Hugh White of Tennessee ran in the South.

The theory was that each candidate could capture electoral votes for the Whig Party in the region where he was strongest. Then the Whig electors could combine on one candidate or, alternatively, throw the election into the House, whichever seemed to their advantage. However, the scheme did not work because Martin Van Buren, the Democratic nominee, captured a majority of the electoral vote.

Another quirk in the system surfaced in 1872. The losing Democratic presidential nominee, Horace Greeley, died between the time of the popular vote and the meeting of the presidential electors. The Democratic electors had no party nominee to vote for, and they were left to their own judgment. Forty-two of the sixty-six Democratic electors chose to vote for the Democratic governor-elect of Indiana, Thomas Hendricks. The rest of the electors split their votes among three other politicians: eighteen for B. Gratz Brown of Missouri, the Democratic vice-presidential nominee; two for Charles J. Jenkins of Georgia; and one for David Davis of Illinois. Three Georgia electors insisted on casting their votes for Greeley, but Congress refused to count them. Counting Republican Ulysses S. Grant, who won, five candidates received electoral votes in 1872, tied for the largest number in U.S. history (five candidates also received electoral votes in 1800 and 1836).

In four elections the electoral college has chosen presidents who ran behind their opponents in the popular vote. In two of these instances—Republican Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876 and Republican Benjamin Harrison in 1888—the winning candidate carried a number of key states by close margins, while losing other states by wide margins. In the third instance—Democratic-Republican John Quincy Adams in 1824—the House chose the new

ELECTORAL COLLEGE CHRONOLOGY

1787. The U.S. Constitution establishes the electoral college system for electing the president: a majority vote of state-appointed “electors” elects the president; each state is free to determine method of choosing electors; the plan calls for second-place finisher to become vice president and for House of Representatives to elect president if no candidate has majority.

1800s. Electoral college is tested in three contentious elections but survives with one significant modification, effective 1804; states gradually move to winner-take-all system, giving electoral votes to winner of the state’s popular vote for president.

1800. Presidential election is thrown into House, which takes thirty-six ballots to elect Thomas Jefferson over Aaron Burr.

1804. The Twelfth Amendment provides for separate election of vice president.

1824–1825. John Quincy Adams trails in popular vote and electoral vote behind Andrew Jackson but is elected president after one House ballot.

1830s. Most states adopt popular election of presidential electors; by 1860 only South Carolina lets state legislature choose.

1845. Congress adopts uniform national election day: first Tuesday after first Monday in November in even-numbered years.

1887. Electoral Vote Count Act specifies states’ authority to determine legality of their choices for electors.

1900s. Proposals to abolish electoral college surface periodically, but no constitutional amendment emerges from Congress.

1950. Senate approves “proportional vote” plan to divide state electors on basis of popular vote; House kills measure.

1960. John F. Kennedy wins electoral college majority over Richard Nixon, 303–219; Kennedy’s popular vote margin is closest in twentieth century. Fourteen unpledged electors and one “faithless” Republican elector vote for Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Virginia Democrat.

1968. Nixon wins electoral college majority over Democrat Hubert H. Humphrey and third-party candidate George Wallace (301–191–46); both Nixon and Humphrey had vowed not to negotiate with Wallace if election were thrown into House.

1969. House approves constitutional amendment to shift to direct popular election of president; measure dies after Senate filibuster in 1970. Maine, in 1969, replaces winner-take-all with district-by-district system.

1980–1988. Electoral college issue fades as Republican candidates win three successive elections with decisive popular votes and electoral majorities. One Democratic elector in 1988 votes for vice-presidential nominee Lloyd Bentsen to protest system.

1992. Strong third-party bid by H. Ross Perot stirs fears of throwing election to House, but Bill Clinton wins electoral college majority as Perot fails to carry any state. Nebraska adopts district voting for electors.

2000–2001. Democrat Al Gore surpasses Republican George W. Bush in popular vote, but electoral college outcome turns on close count in Florida; Gore and Bush vie in state and federal courts over recount. U.S. Supreme Court halts count, settling election contest in Bush’s favor. Final electoral vote tally is Bush 271 (one more than needed to win) and Gore 266 (one fewer than he was entitled to because a District of Columbia elector withheld her vote to protest the District’s lack of congressional representation). When Congress meets to count the electoral votes, several minority and women House members object to Florida’s votes. Gore, presiding as vice president, rules each objection out of order because it was not also signed by a senator, as the 1887 law requires.

2004. Colorado voters defeat a ballot measure, Amendment 36, that would have dropped the “winner-take-all” system and allocated the state’s electoral votes proportionally among the presidential candidates who received the most votes in the state. The measure loses with 65.2 percent against and 34.8 percent in favor. As the winning candidate President George W. Bush receives all nine Colorado electoral votes. Had the measure become law in 2004, Bush would have received only five of Colorado’s electoral votes.

2004–2005. In contrast to 2001, a Democratic senator, Barbara Boxer of California, joins a House petition objecting to Ohio’s electoral votes because of numerous irregularities reported there. Boxer’s action triggers provisions of the 1887 law calling for debates in each chamber on whether to count the Ohio votes. (See box, Law for Counting Electoral Votes in Congress, p. 829). After two hours of debate, the Senate votes 74–1 against Boxer, and the House objection led by Democrat Stephanie Tubbs Jones of Ohio is defeated 267–31. Several of the objectors, including Tubbs Jones, are African Americans and none are Republicans. Bush receives Ohio’s twenty electoral votes and his election is certified.

2009. On January 8 Congress meets in joint session to count the electoral votes from the 2008 presidential election. The process is purely routine. Barack Obama of Illinois, the Democratic candidate for president, and his running mate, Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, each receive 365 votes to 173 votes each for Republicans John McCain of Arizona and his running mate, Sarah Palin of Alaska.

president after no candidate had achieved a majority in the electoral college. In the fourth instance, the 2000 election hinged on Florida’s twenty-five electoral votes, which went to Republican George W. Bush when the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the challenge of the state’s vote count by Democrat Albert “Al” Gore Jr. (See Chapter 9, Chronology of Presidential Elections.)

ELECTION BY CONGRESS

Under the Constitution, Congress has two major responsibilities relating to the election of the president and vice president. First, it is directed to receive and, in joint session, count the electoral votes certified by the states. Second, if no candidate has a majority of the electoral vote, the House of Representatives must elect the president and the Senate the vice president.

Although many of the Framers of the Constitution apparently thought that most elections would be decided by Congress, the House actually has chosen a president only twice, in 1801 and 1825. But a number of campaigns have been deliberately designed to throw elections into the House, where each state has one vote and a majority of states is needed to elect.

In modern times the formal counting of electoral votes has been largely a ceremonial function, but the congressional role can be decisive when votes are contested. The pre-eminent example is the Hayes-Tilden contest of 1876, when congressional decisions on disputed electoral votes from four states gave the election to Republican Hayes despite the fact that Democrat Samuel J. Tilden had a majority of the popular vote. (See "Hayes-Tilden Contest," p. 826.)

From the beginning, the constitutional provisions governing the selection of the president have had few defenders, and many efforts at electoral college reform have been undertaken. Although prospects for reform seemed favorable after the close 1968 presidential election, the Ninety-first Congress (1969–1971) did not take final action on a proposed constitutional amendment that would have provided for direct popular election of the president and eliminated the existing provision for contingent election by the House. Reform legislation was reintroduced in the Senate during the Ninety-fourth Congress (1975–1977) and Ninety-fifth Congress (1977–1979). In the 107th Congress (2001–2003), more talk of reforming or replacing the electoral college system followed the fiercely fought 2000 election, but once again Congress did not act.

In addition to its role in electing the president, Congress bears responsibility in the related areas of presidential succession and disability. The Twelfth Amendment empowers Congress to decide what to do if the president-elect and the vice president-elect both fail to qualify by the date prescribed for commencement of their terms; it also gives Congress authority to settle problems arising from the death of candidates in cases where the election devolves upon Congress. Under the Twenty-fifth Amendment, Congress has ultimate responsibility for resolving disputes over presidential disability. It also must confirm presidential nominations to fill a vacancy in the vice presidency.

Jefferson-Burr Deadlock

The election of 1800 was the first in which the Constitution's contingent election procedures were put to the test and the House elected the president. The Federalists, a declining but still potent political force, nominated John Adams for a second term and chose Charles Cotesworth Pinckney as his running mate. A Democratic-Republican congressional caucus chose Vice President Jefferson for president and Burr, who had been instrumental in winning the New York legislature for the Democratic-Republicans earlier in 1800, for vice president.

The electors met in each state on December 4, with the following results: Jefferson and Burr, seventy-three electoral votes each; Adams, sixty-five; Pinckney, sixty-four; and John Jay, one. The Federalists had lost, but because the Democratic-Republicans had neglected to withhold one electoral vote from Burr, their presidential and vice-presidential candidates were tied, and the election was thrown into the House.

The lame-duck Congress, with a partisan Federalist majority, was still in office for the electoral count, and the possibilities for intrigue were only too apparent. After toying with and rejecting a proposal to block any election until March 4, when Adams's term expired, the Federalists decided to support Burr and thereby elect a relatively pliant politician over a man they considered a "dangerous radical." Alexander Hamilton opposed this move. "I trust the Federalists will not finally be so mad as to vote for Burr," he wrote. "I speak with intimate and accurate knowledge of his character. His elevation can only promote the purposes of the desperate and the profligate. If there be a man in the world I ought to hate, it is Jefferson. With Burr I have always been personally well. But the public good must be paramount to every private consideration."

On February 11, 1801, Congress met in joint session—with Jefferson, the outgoing vice president, in the chair—to count the electoral vote. This ritual ended, the House retired to its own chamber to elect a president. When the House met, it became apparent that Hamilton's advice had been rejected; a majority of Federalists insisted on backing Burr over Jefferson, the man they despised more. Indeed, if Burr had given clear assurances that he would run the country as a Federalist, he might have been elected. But Burr was unwilling to make those assurances; and, as one chronicler put it, "No one knows whether it was honor or a wretched indecision which gagged Burr's lips."

In all, there were 106 members of the House at the time, fifty-eight Federalists and forty-eight Democratic-Republicans. If the ballots had been cast per capita Burr would have been elected, but the Constitution provided that each state should cast a single vote and that a majority of states was necessary for election.

On the first ballot Jefferson received the votes of eight states, one short of a majority of the sixteen states then in the Union. Six states backed Burr. The representatives of Vermont and Maryland were equally divided and, therefore, could not cast their states' votes. By midnight of the first day of voting, nineteen ballots had been taken, and the deadlock remained.

In all, thirty-six ballots were taken before the House came to a decision on February 17. Predictably, there were men who sought to exploit the situation for personal gain. Jefferson wrote: "Many attempts have been made to obtain terms and promises from me. I have declared to them unequivocally that I would not receive the Government on capitulation; that I would not go in with my hands tied."

The impasse was broken finally when Vermont and Maryland switched to support Jefferson. Delaware and South Carolina also withdrew their support from Burr by casting blank ballots. The final vote: ten states for Jefferson, four (all in New England) for Burr. Jefferson became president, and Burr, under the Constitution as it then stood, automatically became vice president.

Federalist James A. Bayard of Delaware, who had played an important role in breaking the deadlock, wrote to Hamilton: “The means existed of electing Burr, but this required his cooperation. By deceiving one man (a great blockhead) and tempting two (not incorruptible), he might have secured a majority of the states. He will never have another chance of being president of the United States; and the little use he has made of the one which has occurred gives me but an humble opinion of the talents of an unprincipled man.”

The Jefferson-Burr contest clearly illustrated the dangers of the double-balloting system established by the original Constitution, and pressure began to build for an amendment requiring separate votes for president and vice president. Congress approved the Twelfth Amendment in December 1803, and the states—acting with unexpected speed—ratified it in time for the 1804 election.

John Quincy Adams Election

The only other time the House of Representatives elected a president was in 1825. There were many contenders in the 1824 election, but four predominated: John Quincy Adams, Henry Clay, William H. Crawford, and Andrew Jackson. Crawford, secretary of the Treasury under President James Monroe, was the early front-runner, but his candidacy faltered after he suffered an incapacitating illness in 1823.

When the electoral votes were counted, Jackson had ninety-nine, Adams eighty-four, Crawford forty-one, and Clay thirty-seven. With eighteen of the twenty-four states choosing their electors by popular vote, Jackson also led in the popular voting, although the significance of the popular vote was open to challenge. Under the Twelfth Amendment, the names of the three top contenders—Jackson, Adams, and the ailing Crawford—were placed before the House. Clay’s support was vital to either of the two front-runners.

From the start, Clay apparently intended to support Adams as the lesser of two evils. But before the House voted, a great scandal erupted. A Philadelphia newspaper published an anonymous letter alleging that Clay had agreed to support Adams in return for being made secretary of state. The letter alleged also that Clay would have been willing to make the same deal with Jackson. Clay immediately denied the charge and pronounced the writer of the letter “a base and infamous character, a dastard and a liar.”

When the House met to vote, Adams was supported by the six New England states and New York and, in large part through Clay’s backing, by Maryland, Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, and Louisiana. A majority of thirteen delegations voted for him—the bare minimum he needed for election, because there were twenty-four states in the Union at the time. The election was accomplished on the first ballot, but Adams took office under a cloud from which his administration never emerged.

Jackson had believed the charges and found his suspicions vindicated when Adams, after the election, appointed Clay as secretary of state. “Was there ever witnessed such a bare-faced corruption in any country before?” Jackson wrote to a friend. Jackson’s successful 1828 campaign made much of his contention that the House of Representatives had thwarted the will of the people by denying him the presidency in 1825, even though he had been the leader in the popular and electoral votes.

Other Anomalies

The Senate has chosen the vice president only once. That was in 1837, when Van Buren was elected president with 170 of the 294 electoral votes while his vice-presidential running mate, Richard M. Johnson, received only 147 electoral votes—one less than a majority. This discrepancy occurred because Van Buren electors from Virginia boycotted Johnson, reportedly in protest against his social behavior. The Senate elected Johnson, 33–16, over Francis Granger of New York, the runner-up in the electoral vote for vice president.

In 1912 President William Howard Taft’s vice president, James S. Sherman, died in October after he and Taft won renomination by the Republican Party. Taft and his substitute running mate, Nicholas Murray Butler, lost the election to Democrats Woodrow Wilson and Thomas R. Marshall. But because it had been too late to change the GOP state ballots, Butler received Sherman’s eight electoral votes.

Although only two presidential elections actually have been decided by the House, a number of others—including those of 1836, 1856, 1860, 1892, 1948, 1960, and 1968—could have been thrown into the House by only a small shift in the popular vote.

The threat of House election was most clearly evident in 1968, when Democrat George C. Wallace of Alabama ran as a strong third-party candidate. Wallace frequently asserted that he could win an outright majority in the electoral college by the addition of key Midwestern and Mountain states to his hoped-for base in the South and border states. In reality, the Wallace campaign had a narrower goal: to win the balance of power in electoral college voting, thereby depriving either major party of the clear electoral majority required for election. Wallace made it clear that he then would expect one of the major party candidates to make concessions in return for enough votes from Wallace electors to win the election. Wallace indicated that he expected the election to be settled in the electoral college and not in the House of Representatives. At the end of the campaign it was disclosed that Wallace had obtained written affidavits from all of his electors in which they promised to vote for Wallace “or whomsoever he may direct” in the electoral college.

In response to the Wallace challenge, both major party candidates, Republican Richard Nixon and Democrat Hubert H. Humphrey, maintained that they would refuse to bargain with Wallace for his electoral votes. Nixon asserted that the House, if the decision rested there, should elect the popular-vote winner. Humphrey said the representatives should select “the president they believe would be best for the country.” Bipartisan efforts to obtain advance agreements from House candidates to vote for the national popular-vote winner if the election should go to the House ended in failure. Neither Nixon nor Humphrey replied to suggestions that they pledge before the election to swing enough electoral votes to the popular-vote winner to ensure his election without help from Wallace.

In the end Wallace received only 13.5 percent of the popular vote and forty-six electoral votes (including the vote of one Republican defector), all from southern states. He failed to win the balance of power in the electoral college, which he had hoped to use to wring policy concessions from one of the major party candidates. If Wallace had won a few border states, or if a few thousand more Democratic votes had been cast in northern states barely carried by Nixon, reducing Nixon’s electoral vote below 270, Wallace would have been in a position to bargain off his electoral votes or to throw the election into the House for final settlement. Wallace later told journalist Neal R. Peirce that he would have tried to instruct his electors to vote for Nixon rather than have the election go to the House.

COUNTING THE ELECTORAL VOTE

Over the years Congress has mandated a variety of dates for the casting of popular votes, the meeting of the electors to cast ballots in the various states, and the official counting of the electoral votes before both houses of Congress.

The Continental Congress made the provisions for the first election. On September 13, 1788, it directed that each state choose its electors on the first Wednesday in January 1789. It further directed these electors to cast their ballots on the first Wednesday in February 1789.

In 1792 the Second Congress passed legislation setting up a permanent calendar for choosing electors. Allowing some flexibility in dates, the law directed that states choose their electors within the thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December of each presidential election year. Then the electors would meet in their various states and cast their ballots on the first Wednesday in December. On the second Wednesday of the following February, the votes were to be opened and counted before a joint session of Congress. Provision also was made for a special presidential election in case of the removal, death, resignation, or disability of both the president and vice president.

Under that system, states chose presidential electors at various times. For instance, in 1840 the popular balloting for electors began in Pennsylvania and Ohio on October 30 and ended in North Carolina on November 12. South Carolina, the only state still choosing presidential electors through its state legislature, appointed its electors on November 26.

Congress modified the system in 1845, providing that each state choose its electors on the same day—the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November—a provision that still remains in force. Otherwise, the days for casting and counting the electoral votes remained the same.

The next change occurred in 1887, when Congress provided that electors were to meet and cast their ballots on the second Monday in January instead of the first Wednesday in December. Congress also dropped the provision for a special presidential election.

In 1934 Congress again revised the law. The new arrangements, still in force, directed the electors to meet on the first Monday after the second Wednesday in December. The ballots are opened and counted before Congress on January 6 (the next day if January 6 falls on a Sunday).

The Constitution states: “The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted.” It gives no guidance on disputed ballots. Early objections to electoral votes usually arose from disputes about whether a state had fully qualified for statehood. After the Civil War, some southern votes were contested on grounds that the states were still considered in “insurrection” against the United States.

Before counting the electoral votes in 1865, Congress adopted the Twenty-second Joint Rule, which provided that no electoral votes objected to in joint session could be counted except by the concurrent votes of both the Senate and House. The rule was pushed by congressional Republicans to ensure rejection of the electoral votes from the newly reconstructed states of Louisiana and Tennessee. Under this rule, Congress in 1873 also threw out the electoral votes of Louisiana and Arkansas and three from Georgia.

The rule lapsed at the beginning of 1876, however, when the Senate refused to readopt it because the House was under Democratic control. As a consequence, Congress had no rules to guide it following the 1876 Hayes-Tilden election, when it became apparent that for the first time the outcome of an election would be determined by decisions on disputed electoral votes.

Hayes-Tilden Contest

The 1876 campaign pitted Republican Hayes against Democrat Tilden. Early returns indicated that Tilden had been elected. He had won the swing states of Indiana, New York, Connecticut, and New Jersey. Those states plus his expected southern support would give Tilden the election. However,

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION BY THE HOUSE

The following rules, reprinted from Hinds's Precedents of the House of Representatives, were adopted by the House in 1825 for use in deciding the presidential election of 1824. They would provide a precedent for any future House election of a president, although the House could change them.

1. In the event of its appearing, on opening all the certificates, and counting the votes given by the electors of the several States for President, that no person has a majority of the votes of the whole number of electors appointed, the same shall be entered on the Journals of this House.

2. The roll of the House shall then be called by States; and, on its appearing that a Member or Members from two-thirds of the States are present, the House shall immediately proceed, by ballot, to choose a President from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President; and, in case neither of those persons shall receive the votes of a majority of all the states on the first ballot, the House shall continue to ballot for a President, without interruption by other business, until a President be chosen.

3. The doors of the Hall shall be closed during the balloting, except against the Members of the Senate, stenographers, and the officers of the House.

4. From the commencement of the balloting until an election is made no proposition to adjourn shall be received, unless on the motion of one State, seconded by another State, and the question shall be decided by States. The same rule shall be observed in regard to any motion to change the usual hour for the meeting of the House.

5. In balloting the following mode shall be observed, to wit:

The Representatives of each State shall be arranged and seated together, beginning with the seats at the right hand of the Speaker's chair, with the Members from the State of Maine; thence, proceeding with the Members from the States, in the order the States are usually named for receiving petitions<sup>1</sup> around the Hall of the House, until all are seated.

A ballot box shall be provided for each State.

The Representatives of each State shall, in the first instance, ballot among themselves, in order to ascertain the vote of their State; and they may, if necessary, appoint tellers of their ballots.

After the vote of each State is ascertained, duplicates thereof shall be made out; and in case any one of the persons from whom the choice is to be made shall receive a majority of the votes given, on any one balloting by the Representatives of a State, the name of that person shall be written on each of the duplicates; and in case the votes so given shall be divided so that neither of said persons shall have a majority of the whole number of votes given by such State, on any one balloting, then the word "divided" shall be written on each duplicate.

After the delegation from each State shall have ascertained the vote of their State, the Clerk shall name the States in the order they are usually named for receiving petitions; and as the name of each is called the Sergeant-at-Arms shall present to the delegation of each two ballot boxes, in each of which shall be deposited, by some Representative of the State, one of the duplicates made as aforesaid of the vote of said State, in the presence and subject to the examination of all the Members from said State then present; and where there is more than one Representative from a State, the duplicates shall not both be deposited by the same person.

When the votes of the States are thus all taken in, the Sergeant-at-Arms shall carry one of said ballot boxes to one table and the other to a separate and distinct table.

One person from each State represented in the balloting shall be appointed by the Representatives to tell off said ballots; but, in case the Representatives fail to appoint a teller, the Speaker shall appoint.

The said tellers shall divide themselves into two sets, as nearly equal in number as can be, and one of the said sets of tellers shall proceed to count the votes in one of said boxes, and the other set the votes in the other box.

When the votes are counted by the different sets of tellers, the result shall be reported to the House; and if the reports agree, the same shall be accepted as the true votes of the States; but if the reports disagree, the States shall proceed, in the same manner as before, to a new ballot.

6. All questions arising after the balloting commences, requiring the decision of the House, which shall be decided by the House, voting per capita, to be incidental to the power of choosing a President, shall be decided by States without debate; and in case of an equal division of the votes of States, the question shall be lost.

7. When either of the persons from whom the choice is to be made shall have received a majority of all the States, the Speaker shall declare the same, and that that person is elected President of the United States.

8. The result shall be immediately communicated to the Senate by message, and a committee of three persons shall be appointed to inform the President of the United States and the President-elect of said election.

On February 9, 1825, the election of John Quincy Adams took place in accordance with these rules.

1. Petitions are no longer introduced in this way. This old procedure of calling the states beginning with Maine proceeded through the original thirteen states and then through the remaining states in the order of their admission to the Union.

by the following morning it became apparent that if the Republicans could hold South Carolina, Florida, and Louisiana, Hayes would be elected with 185 electoral votes to 184 for Tilden. But if a single elector in any of these states voted for Tilden, he would throw the election to the Democrats. Tilden led in the popular-vote count by more than a quarter million votes.

The situation was much the same in each of the three contested states. Historian Eugene H. Roseboom described it as follows:

The Republicans controlled the state governments and the election machinery, had relied upon the Negro masses for votes, and had practiced frauds as in the past. The Democrats used threats, intimidation, and even violence when necessary, to keep Negroes from the polls; and where they were in a position to do so they resorted to fraud also. The firm determination of the whites to overthrow carpetbag rule contributed to make a full and fair vote impossible; carpetbag hold on the state governments made a fair count impossible. Radical reconstruction was reaping its final harvest.

Both parties pursued the votes of the three states with a fine disregard for propriety or legality, and in the end double sets of elector returns were sent to Congress from all three. Oregon also sent two sets of returns. Although Hayes carried that state, the Democratic governor discovered that one of the Hayes electors was a postmaster and therefore ineligible under the Constitution, so he certified the election of the top-polling Democratic elector. However, the Republican electors met, received the resignation of their ineligible colleague, then reappointed him to the vacancy because he had in the meantime resigned his postmastership.

Had the Twenty-second Joint Rule remained in effect, the Democratic House of Representatives could have objected to any of Hayes's disputed votes. But because the rule had lapsed, Congress had to find a new method of resolving electoral disputes. A joint committee was created to work out a plan, and the resulting Electoral Commission Law was approved by large majorities and signed into law January 29, 1877—only days before the date scheduled for counting the electoral votes.

The law, which applied only to the 1876 electoral vote count, established a fifteen-member commission that was to have final authority over disputed electoral votes, unless both houses of Congress agreed to overrule it. The commission was to consist of five senators, five representatives, and five Supreme Court justices. Each chamber was to appoint its own members of the commission, with the understanding that the majority party would have three members and the minority two. Four justices, two from each party, were named in the bill, and these four were to select the fifth. It was expected that they would choose Justice David Davis, who was considered a political independent, but he disqualified himself when the Illinois legislature named him to a seat in the Senate. Justice Joseph P. Bradley, a Republican, then was named to the fifteenth seat. The Democrats supported his selection because they considered him the most independent of the remaining justices, all of whom were Republicans. However, he was to vote with the Republicans on every dispute and thus ensure the victory of Hayes.

The electoral count began in Congress February 1 (moved up from the second Wednesday in February for this one election), and the proceedings continued until March 2. States were called in alphabetical order, and as each disputed state was reached objections were raised to both the Hayes and Tilden electors. The question was then referred to the electoral commission, which in every case voted 8–7 for Hayes. In each case, the Democratic House rejected the commission's decision, but the Republican Senate upheld it, so the decision stood.

As the count went on, Democrats in the House threatened to launch a filibuster to block resumption of joint sessions so that the count could not be completed before Inauguration Day. The threat was never carried out because of an agreement reached between the Hayes forces and southern conservatives. The southerners agreed to let the electoral count continue without obstruction. In return Hayes agreed that, as president, he would withdraw federal troops from the South, end Reconstruction, and make other concessions. The southerners, for their part, pledged to respect African American rights, a pledge they did not carry out.

Consequently, at 4 a.m. March 2, 1877, the president of the Senate was able to announce that Hayes had been elected president with 185 electoral votes, as against 184 for Tilden. Later that day Hayes arrived in Washington. The next evening he took the oath of office privately at the White House, because March 4 fell on a Sunday. His formal inauguration followed on Monday. The country acquiesced. So ended a crisis that could have resulted in renewed civil war.

Not until 1887 did Congress enact permanent legislation on the handling of disputed electoral votes. The Electoral Count Act of that year gave each state final authority in determining the legality of its choice of electors and required a concurrent majority of both the Senate and House to reject any electoral votes. It also established procedures for counting electoral votes in Congress. (See box, Law for Counting Electoral Votes in Congress, p. 829.)

Application of the 1887 Law in 1969

The procedures relating to disputed electoral votes were used for the first time after the election of 1968. When Congress met in joint session January 6, 1969, to count the electoral votes, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie of Maine and Rep. James G. O'Hara of Michigan, both Democrats, joined by six other senators and thirty-seven other representatives, filed a written objection to the vote cast by a North Carolina elector, Lloyd W. Bailey of Rocky Mount. He had been elected as a Republican but chose to vote for George Wallace and Curtis LeMay, the candidates of the American Independent Party, instead of Republican Nixon and his running mate, Spiro T. Agnew.

Acting under the 1887 law, Muskie and O'Hara objected to Bailey's vote on the grounds that it was "not properly given" because a plurality of the popular votes in North Carolina were cast for Nixon-Agnew and the state's voters had chosen electors to vote for Nixon and Agnew only. Muskie and O'Hara asked that Bailey's vote not be counted at all by Congress.

The 1887 statute stipulated that "no electoral vote or votes from any State which shall have been regularly given by electors whose appointment has been lawfully certified ... from which but one return has been received shall be rejected, but the two Houses concurrently may reject the vote or votes when they agree that such vote or votes have not been so regularly given by electors whose appointment has been so certified." The statute did not define the term "regularly given," although at the time of its adoption the chief concern centered on problems of dual sets of electoral vote returns from a state, votes cast on an improper day, or

LAW FOR COUNTING ELECTORAL VOTES IN CONGRESS

Following is the complete text of Title 3, section 15 of the U.S. Code, enacted originally in 1887, governing the counting of electoral votes in Congress:

Congress shall be in session on the sixth day of January succeeding every meeting of the electors. The Senate and House of Representatives shall meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the hour of 1 o'clock in the afternoon on that day, and the President of the Senate shall be their presiding officer. Two tellers shall be previously appointed on the part of the Senate and two on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom shall be handed, as they are opened by the President of the Senate, all the certificates and papers purporting to be certificates of the electoral votes, which certificates and papers shall be opened, presented, and acted upon in the alphabetical order of the States, beginning with the letter A; and said tellers, having then read the same in the presence and hearing of the two Houses, shall make a list of the votes as they shall appear from the said certificates; and the votes having been ascertained and counted according to the rules in this subchapter provided, the result of the same shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall thereupon announce the state of the vote, which announcement shall be deemed a sufficient declaration of the persons, if any, elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses. Upon such reading of any such certificate or paper, the President of the Senate shall call for objections, if any. Every objection shall be made in writing, and shall state clearly and concisely, and without argument, the ground thereof, and shall be signed by at least one Senator and one Member of the House of Representatives before the same shall be received. When all objections so made to any vote or paper from a State shall have been received and read, the Senate shall thereupon withdraw, and such objections shall be submitted to the Senate for its decision; and the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall, in like manner, submit such objections to the House of Representatives for its decision; and no electoral vote or votes from any State which shall have been regularly given by electors whose appointment has been lawfully certified to according to section 6<sup>1</sup> of this title from which but one return has been received shall be rejected, but the two Houses concurrently may reject the vote or votes when they agree that such vote or votes have not been so regularly given by electors whose appointment has been so certified. If more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State shall have been received by the President of the Senate, those votes, and those only, shall be counted which shall have been regularly given by the electors who are shown by the determination mentioned in section 5<sup>2</sup> of this title to have been appointed, if the determination in said section provided for shall have been made, or by such successors or substitutes, in case of a vacancy in the board of electors so ascertained, as have been appointed to fill such vacancy in the mode provided by the laws of the State; but in case there shall arise the question which of two or more of such State authorities determining what electors have been appointed, as mentioned in section 5 of this title, is the lawful tribunal of such State, the votes regularly given of those electors, and those only, of such State shall be counted whose title as electors the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide is supported by the decision of such State so authorized by its law; and in such case of more than one return or paper purporting to be a return from a State, if there shall have been no such determination of the question in the State aforesaid, then those votes, and those only, shall be counted which the two Houses shall concurrently decide were cast by lawful electors appointed in accordance with the laws of the State, unless the two Houses, acting separately, shall concurrently decide such votes not to be the lawful votes of the legally appointed electors of such State. But if the two Houses shall disagree in respect of the counting of such votes, then, and in that case, the votes of the electors whose appointment shall have been certified by the executive of the State, under the seal thereof, shall be counted. When the two Houses have voted, they shall immediately again meet, and the presiding officer shall then announce the decision of the questions submitted. No votes or papers from any other State shall be acted upon until the objections previously made to the votes or papers from any State shall have been finally disposed of.

1. Section 6 provides for certification of votes by electors by state governors.

2. Section 5 provides that if state law specifies a method for resolving disputes concerning the vote for presidential electors, Congress must respect any determination so made by a state.

votes disputed because of uncertainty about whether a state lawfully was in the Union when the vote was cast.

The 1887 statute provided that if written objection to any state's vote was received from at least one member of both the Senate and House, the two legislative bodies were to retire immediately to separate sessions, debate for two hours with a five-minute limitation on speeches, and each decide the issue by vote before resuming the joint session. The statute made clear that both the Senate and House had to reject a challenged electoral vote (or votes) for such action to prevail.

At the January 6 joint session, with President Pro Tempore Richard B. Russell, Georgia Democrat, presiding, the counting of the electoral vote proceeded smoothly through the alphabetical order of states until the North Carolina result was announced, at which time O'Hara rose to announce filing of the complaint. The two houses then reassembled in joint session, at which the results of the separate deliberations were announced and the count of the electoral vote by state proceeded without event. At the conclusion, Russell announced the vote and declared Nixon and Agnew elected.

Application of the 1887 Law in 2001

The U.S. Supreme Court's peremptory 5–4 ruling in Bush v. Gore that ended the recount of Florida's extremely close presidential vote left many Americans angry and embittered. Vice President Albert "Al" Gore Jr., the Democratic nominee, had bested Republican governor George W. Bush of Texas by more than a half-million votes in the popular election and also led in the electoral vote, pending determination of the Florida winner. African Americans were particularly dissatisfied with the result. They had overwhelmingly supported Gore nationally, and in Florida their votes made up a disproportionately large share of the ballots not counted because of problems with the obsolete punch-card voting system used in many counties. These voters and many others felt that the majority had been disfranchised and that Gore might have won had the Court not stopped the recount.

But the Court's ruling left no recourse through the judicial system. Only one step remained before the 2000 election became official: the formal counting of the 538 electoral votes by both chambers of Congress. When that day came, on January 6, 2001, twenty Democratic House members, mostly members of the Congressional Black Caucus, made a last-ditch effort to deny Florida's twenty-five electoral votes to Bush. With Gore, as the outgoing vice president, presiding over the session, each House member submitted a written objection to the counting of Florida's votes. Gore asked each representative if the objection were also signed by a senator, as the 1887 law required. When each responded no, Gore ruled the objection out of order. At one point he thanked Rep. Jesse L. Jackson Jr. of Illinois for his remarks and said, "But, hey," and spread his arms in a gesture of futility.

It was the first time since the 1969 faithless elector incident that there had been any objections to the counting of electoral votes. In the 2001 counting there was one abstention, by a District of Columbia elector for Gore, resulting in a total of 537 electoral votes being cast.

Application of the 1887 Law in 2005

The partisan bitterness that characterized the 2000 presidential election remained virulent in 2004. Many states had changed their voting systems in the preceding four years, but the changes did not always build confidence that every vote would be counted. There were widespread complaints about the new electronic systems, most of which left no "paper trail" of ballot receipts that could be counted in case of a disputed outcome. Breakdowns of the computerized machines and unfamiliarity with their operation led to unusually long waits for voters. Some gave up and left without voting. Some who voted feared that their vote had not been recorded. In Ohio and other states, those who felt disfranchised were disproportionately minority voters. President George W. Bush carried Ohio by 118,000 votes.

On December 30, 2004, Democratic representative John Conyers of Michigan wrote to all senators asking for their support in challenging Ohio's twenty electoral votes because of "numerous unexplained irregularities" in the state's presidential vote. In contrast to 2001, when no senator provided the necessary signature for a challenge to Florida's vote, Democratic senator Barbara Boxer of California signed the House petition for a debate on Ohio's vote. On January 6, 2005, when Congress met in joint session to count the electoral votes, presiding officer Vice President Richard B. Cheney, in accordance with the 1887 law, directed the House and Senate to their respective chambers for a two-hour debate on the Ohio vote question. In the House, several white members joined Conyers and other African Americans, including Democrat Stephanie Tubbs Jones of Ohio, in objecting to the Ohio votes. The vote in the House was 267–31 against Tubbs Jones's objection. The Senate voted 74–1 against Boxer's position.

In the electoral college, Democratic presidential nominee John F. Kerry was denied one of Minnesota's ten electoral votes when an elector voted for Kerry's running mate, John Edwards, for president. Because the voting was secret, the name of the defector was never identified. Kerry was to have received 252 electoral votes, including all ten of Minnesota's votes, but the defection reduced Kerry's total to 251. The unknown defector, however, also voted for Edwards for vice president, making his national total 252 votes.

REFORM PROPOSALS

Since January 6, 1797, when Rep. William L. Smith, a South Carolina Federalist, introduced in Congress the first proposed constitutional amendment for reform of the electoral college system, hardly a session of Congress has passed without the introduction of one or more resolutions of this nature. In all, more than seven hundred such proposals have been submitted. But only one—the Twelfth Amendment, ratified in 1804—ever has been approved.

In recent years, public interest in a change in the electoral college system was spurred by the close 1960, 1968, and 2000 elections, by a series of Supreme Court rulings relating to apportionment and redistricting, and by the introduction of unpledged elector systems in the southern states.

House Approval of Amendment

Early in 1969 President Nixon asked Congress to take prompt action on electoral college reform. He said he would support any plan that would eliminate individual electors and distribute among the presidential candidates the electoral vote of every state and the District of Columbia in a manner more closely approximating the popular vote.

Later that year the House approved, 338–70, a resolution proposing a constitutional amendment to eliminate the electoral college and to provide instead for direct popular election of the president and vice president. The measure set a minimum of 40 percent of the popular vote as sufficient for election and provided for a runoff election between the two top candidates for the presidency if no candidate received 40 percent. Under this plan the House of Representatives would no longer be called on to select a president.

The proposed amendment also authorized Congress to provide a method of filling vacancies caused by the death, resignation, or disability of presidential nominees before the election and a method of filling postelection vacancies caused by the death of the president-elect or vice president-elect.

Nixon, who previously had favored a proportional plan of allocating each state's electoral votes, endorsed the House resolution and urged the Senate to adopt it. To become effective, the proposed amendment had to be approved by a two-thirds majority in both the Senate and House and be ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. When the proposal reached the Senate floor in September 1970, senators from small states and the South succeeded in blocking final action. The resolution was laid aside October 5, after two unsuccessful efforts to cut off debate by invoking cloture.

Carter Endorsement of Plan

Another major effort to eliminate the electoral college occurred in 1977, when President Jimmy Carter included such a proposal in his election reform package, unveiled March 22. Carter endorsed the amendment approved by the House in 1969 to replace the electoral college with direct popular election of the president and vice president, and provide for a runoff if no candidate received at least 40 percent of the vote. Because the Senate again was seen as the major stumbling block, the House waited to see what the Senate would do before beginning any deliberation of its own.

After several months of deadlock, the Senate Judiciary Committee approved September 15 the direct presidential election plan by a 9–8 vote. But Senate opponents threatened a filibuster, and the Senate leadership decided it could not spare the time or effort to try to break it. The measure was never brought to the floor and died when the Ninety-fifth Congress adjourned in 1978.

On January 15, 1979, the opening day of the Ninety-sixth Congress, Sen. Birch Bayh, Indiana Democrat, began another effort to abolish the electoral college through a constitutional amendment. In putting off action in the previous Congress, Senate leaders had agreed to try for early action in the Ninety-sixth.

A proposed constitutional amendment to abolish the electoral college and elect the president by popular vote did reach the Senate floor in July 1979. The Senate voted in favor of the measure, 51 to 48, fifteen votes short of the required two-thirds majority of those present and voting needed to approve a constitutional amendment.

Supporters of the resolution blamed defections by several northern liberals for the margin of defeat. Major Jewish and black groups extensively lobbied the northern senators, arguing that the voting strength of black and Jewish voters is maximized under the electoral college system because both groups are concentrated in urban areas of the large electoral vote states.

Alternative Plans

Besides direct election of the president and vice president, two other major proposals to replace the electoral college have gained considerable support. One is the district plan, similar to the Maine and Nebraska systems, that would award an electoral vote to the candidate who carried a congressional district and two to the candidate who carried the state as a whole. The other is the proportional plan that would distribute a state's electoral votes on the basis of the proportion of the vote each candidate received.

Had any of the three plans been in effect since 1960, the outcome of several close elections would have been different, according to Stephen J. Wayne, professor of American Government at Georgetown University. In his book The Road to the White House, 2000, Wayne calculates that the district plan would have elected Richard Nixon in 1960 over John F. Kennedy, and that in 1976 it would have resulted in an electoral college tie between Gerald R. Ford and Jimmy Carter. The proportional plan would have thrown the 1960, 1968, 1992, and 1996 elections to the House of Representatives, because none of the candidates would have received an electoral vote majority.

Wayne advocated direct election, which he said would require a national system of voting and tabulating of the results. The United States had neither at the beginning of the twenty-first century. Of the eleven presidential elections since 1960, only the 2000 election would have had a different result under direct election. As the popular vote winner, Gore would have been elected over George W. Bush. Although the 1960 popular vote was even closer, Kennedy won both the popular and electoral college votes.

As in the 1969 plan, most of the direct election proposals call for a minimum plurality, usually 40 percent, with a runoff election to be held if no candidate receives the minimum percentage.

PRESIDENTIAL DISABILITY

A decade of congressional concern over the question of presidential disability was eased in 1967 by ratification of the Twenty-fifth Amendment to the Constitution. The amendment for the first time provided for continuity in carrying out the functions of the presidency in the event of presidential disability and for filling a vacancy in the vice presidency. The amendment was approved by the Senate and House in 1965 and took effect February 10, 1967, after ratification by thirty-eight states. (See "Constitutional Provisions and Amendments on Elections," p. 1735, in Reference Materials, Vol. II.) Congressional consideration of the problem of presidential disability had been prompted by President Ford and Vice President Rockefeller confer in the Oval Office in 1974. For the first time in American history, the two highest executive positions were held by men appointed, not elected, to their posts.

President Dwight D. Eisenhower's heart attack in 1955. The ambiguity of the language of the disability clause (Article II, Section 1, Clause 5) of the Constitution had provoked occasional debate ever since the Constitutional Convention of 1787. But it never had been decided how far the term disability extended or who would be the judge of it.

Clause 5 provided that Congress should decide who was to succeed to the presidency if both the president and the vice president died, resigned, or became disabled. Congress enacted succession laws three times. By the Act of March 1, 1792, it provided for succession (after the vice president) of the president pro tempore of the Senate, then of the House Speaker; if those offices were vacant, states were to send electors to Washington to choose a new president.

That law stood until passage of the Presidential Succession Act of January 19, 1886, which changed the line of succession to run from the vice president to the secretary of state, secretary of the Treasury, and so on through the cabinet in order of rank. Sixty-one years later the Presidential Succession Act of July 18, 1947 (still in force), placed the Speaker of the House and the president pro tempore of the Senate ahead of cabinet officers in succession after the vice president.

Before ratification of the Twenty-fifth Amendment, no procedures had been laid down to govern situations arising in the event of presidential incapacity or of a vacancy in the office of vice president. Two presidents had had serious disabilities: James A. Garfield was shot in 1881 and confined to his bed until he died two and a half months later, and Woodrow Wilson suffered a stroke in 1919. In each case the vice president did not assume any duties of the presidency for fear he would appear to be usurping the powers of that office.

Ratification of the Twenty-fifth Amendment established procedures that clarified these areas of uncertainty in the Constitution. The amendment provided that the vice president should become acting president under either one of two circumstances: (1) if the president informed Congress of inability to perform duties, the vice president would become acting president until the president could resume normal responsibilities; (2) if the vice president and a majority of the cabinet, or another body designated by Congress, found the president to be incapacitated, the vice president would become acting president until the president informed Congress that the disability had ended. Congress was given twenty-one days to resolve any dispute over the president's disability; a two-thirds vote of both chambers was required to overrule the president's declaration of being no longer incapacitated.

Vacancy in the Vice Presidency

The Twenty-fifth Amendment also specified what to do when a vacancy occurred in the office of the vice president, by death, succession to the presidency, or resignation. Through July 2005 the United States has been without a vice president eighteen times for a total of forty years, but since the amendment went into effect such vacancies have been brief. Under the amendment, the president nominates a replacement vice president, with the nomination subject to confirmation by a majority vote of both chambers of Congress. Within only eight years after ratification, two presidents used the power to appoint a new vice president.

In October 1973 when Vice President Agnew resigned, President Nixon nominated Gerald R. Ford as the new vice president. Ford was confirmed by both houses of Congress and sworn in December 6, 1973. On Nixon's resignation August 9, 1974, Ford succeeded to the presidency, becoming the first president in American history who was elected neither to the presidency nor to the vice presidency. President Ford chose as his new vice president Nelson A. Rockefeller, former governor of New York, who was sworn in December 19, 1974.

With both the president and vice president holding office through appointment rather than election, members of Congress and the public expressed concern about the power of a president to appoint, in effect, his or her own successor. Accordingly, Sen. John O. Pastore, Rhode Island Democrat, introduced a proposed constitutional amendment February 3, 1975, to provide for a special national election for president when more than one year remained in a presidential term. Hearings were held before the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Constitutional Amendments, but no action was taken.

Invoking the Twenty-Fifth Amendment

In the aftermath of the attempted assassination of President Ronald Reagan in March 1981, there was no need to invoke the presidential disability provisions of the Twenty-fifth Amendment. However, some of the public statements made by administration officials immediately after the president was shot by John W. Hinckley Jr. reflected continuing confusion over the issue of who is in charge when the president temporarily is unable to function. Soon after news of the shooting became known, the members of the Reagan cabinet gathered in the White House, ready to invoke the amendment's procedures, if necessary. Vice President George H.W. Bush was on an Air Force jet returning to Washington from Texas.

At a televised press briefing later that afternoon, Secretary of State Alexander M. Haig Jr. confirmed that Reagan was in surgery and under anesthesia. It was clear that he temporarily was unable to make presidential decisions should the occasion—such as a foreign attack or other national emergency—require them. Attempting to reassure the country, Haig stated that he was in control in the White House pending the return of Vice President Bush, with whom he was in contact.

This assertion was followed by a question from the press about who was making administration decisions. Haig responded, "Constitutionally, gentlemen, you have the president, the vice president, and the secretary of state in that order, and should the president decide he wants to transfer the helm to the vice president, he will do so. He has not done that. As of now, I am in control here, in the White House, pending the return of the vice president and in close touch with him. If something came up, I would check with him, of course." Actually, the Constitution is silent on the order of succession beyond the vice president. Haig was referring to succession under laws superseded by the 1947 act, which specifies that the line of succession is the vice president, the Speaker of the House, the president pro tempore of the Senate, and then the cabinet officials in order of rank.

Criticism of the administration's failure to act after Reagan was shot shaped its response to the second instance of presidential disability, Reagan's cancer surgery on July 13, 1985. This time Reagan did relinquish his powers and duties to Vice President George H. W. Bush before undergoing anesthesia. Curiously, however, he did not explicitly invoke the Twenty-fifth Amendment, saying instead that he was not convinced that the amendment was meant to apply to "such brief and temporary periods of incapacity." Still, a precedent was established that the Twenty-fifth Amendment would work as intended in future administrations. This precedent was followed in May 1991 when President George H. W. Bush said he would turn power over to Vice President Dan Quayle if his irregular heartbeat required electroshock therapy. It did not.

George W. Bush invoked the amendment when he underwent a colonoscopy that required anesthesia on June 29, 2002. In a letter citing his upcoming procedure, he temporarily transferred his powers to Vice President Richard B. Cheney: "In view of present circumstances, I have determined to transfer temporarily my Constitutional powers and duties to the Vice President during the brief period of the procedure and recovery." Two hours after the procedure, he transmitted a second letter announcing the resumption of the powers and duties of his office: "In accordance with the provisions of Section 3 of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution, this letter shall constitute my written declaration that I am presently able to resume the discharge of the Constitutional powers and duties of the office of President of the United States."

Electoral Votes for President, 1789–2008

ELECTORAL MAPS and vote charts for all presidential elections from 1789 to 2008 are presented in this chapter. The sources for electoral votes cast for presidential candidates are the Senate Manual (Washington, D.C., U.S. Government Printing Office, 1997) and CQ Weekly Report.

Article II, Section 1 of the Constitution gives each state a number of electors equal to the number of senators and representatives to which it is entitled. Total electoral votes for each state through the 2000 election were compiled from a chart of each apportionment of the House of Representatives, published in Kenneth C. Martis and Gregory A. Elmes, The Historical Atlas of State Power in Congress, 1790–1990 (Washington, D.C., CQ Press, 1993), pp. 6–7.

Under the Constitution (Article II, Section 1) each presidential elector was originally given two votes and was required to cast each vote for a different person. The person receiving the highest number of votes from a majority of electors was elected president; the person receiving the second highest total became vice president. For the first presidential election in 1789, there were sixty-nine electors, and George Washington's sixty-nine votes constituted a unanimous election. After ratification of the Twelfth Amendment in 1804, electors were required to designate which of their two votes was for president and which was for vice president. The electoral college charts on pages 836–839 show all electoral votes cast in the elections of 1789, 1792, 1796, and 1800; the charts for 1804 and thereafter show electoral votes cast only for president.

For electoral votes cast for vice-presidential candidates, see pages 892–893 at the end of this chapter.

1. Liberal Republican and Democratic presidential candidate Horace Greeley died November 29, 1872. In the electoral college, the electors who had been pledged to Greeley split their presidential electoral votes among four candidates, including 18 for Benjamin Gratz Brown, Greeley's running mate.

2. Congress refused to accept the electoral votes of Arkansas and Louisiana because of disruptive conditions during Reconstruction.

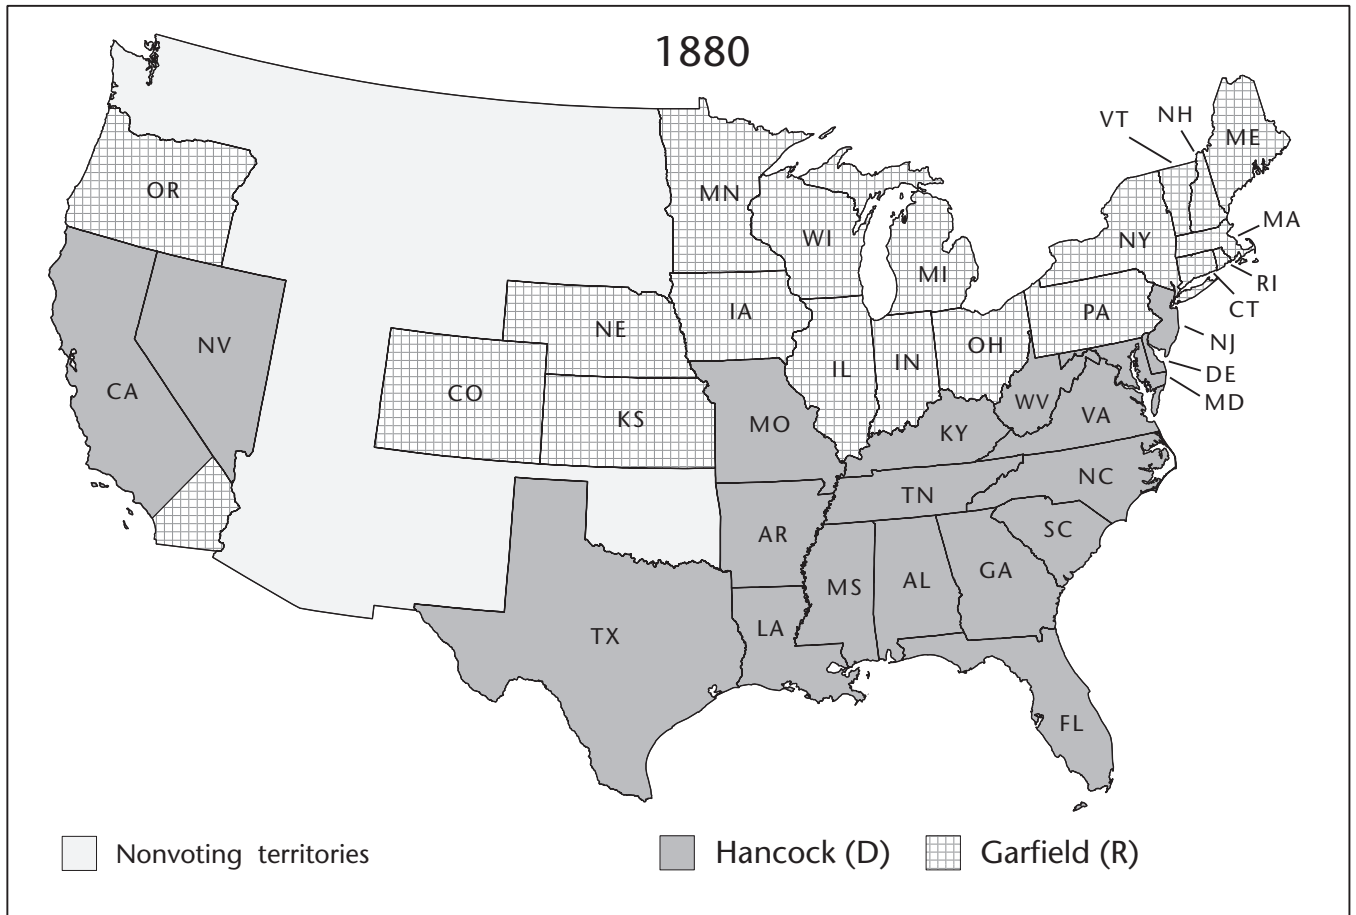

3. Three Georgia electoral votes cast for Greeley were not counted.

Electoral Votes for Vice President, 1804–2008

The following list gives the electoral votes for vice president from 1804 to 2008. Unless indicated by a note, the state-by-state breakdown of electoral votes for each party's vice-presidential candidate was the same as for that party's presidential candidate.

Prior to 1804, under Article II, Section 1 of the Constitution, each elector cast two votes—each vote for a different person. The electors did not distinguish between votes for president and vice president. The candidate receiving the second highest total became vice president. The Twelfth Amendment, ratified in 1804, required electors to vote separately for president and vice president.

In some cases, persons had received electoral votes although they had never been formally nominated. The word candidate is used in this section to designate persons receiving electoral votes.

The Senate Manual (Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1997) was the source used for vice-presidential electoral votes for all elections up to 1996. The source for 2000, 2004, and 2008 was Rhodes Cook, American Votes 28 (Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 2009).

For political party designation, the basic source was Svend Petersen, A Statistical History of the American Presidential Elections (Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1981). Petersen gives the party designation of presidential candidates only. CQ Press adopted Petersen's party designations for the running mates of presidential candidates.

To supplement Petersen, CQ Press editors consulted the Biographical Directory of the American Congress, 1774–1996 (Washington, D.C.: CQ Staff Directories, 1997); the Dictionary of American Biography (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1928–1936); the Encyclopedia of American Biography (New York: Harper and Row, 1974); and Who Was Who in America, 1607–1968 (Chicago: Marquis Co., 1943–1968).

1. New York cast 13 presidential electoral votes for Democratic-Republican James Madison and 6 votes for Clinton; for vice president, New York cast 13 votes for Clinton, 3 votes for Madison, and 3 votes for Monroe. Langdon received Ohio's 3 votes and Vermont's 6 votes.

2. The state-by-state vote for Gerry was the same as for Democratic-Republican presidential candidate Madison, except for Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Massachusetts cast 2 votes for Gerry and 20 votes for Ingersoll; New Hampshire cast 1 vote for Gerry and 7 votes for Ingersoll.

3. Four Federalists received vice-presidential electoral votes: Howard—Massachusetts, 22 votes; Ross—Connecticut, 5 votes; Marshall—Connecticut, 4 votes; Harper—Delaware, 3 votes.

4. The state-by-state vote for Tompkins was the same as for Democratic-Republican presidential candidate Monroe, except for Delaware, Maryland, and Massachusetts. Delaware cast 4 votes for Rodney; Maryland cast 10 votes for Tompkins and 1 for Harper; Massachusetts cast 7 votes for Tompkins and 8 for Stockton.

New Hampshire, which cast 7 presidential electoral votes for Monroe and 1 vote for John Quincy Adams, cast 7 vice-presidential electoral votes for Tompkins and 1 vote for Rush.

5. The state-by-state vice-presidential electoral vote was as follows:

Calhoun—Alabama, 5 votes; Delaware, 1 vote; Illinois, 3 votes; Indiana, 5 votes; Kentucky, 7 votes; Louisiana, 5 votes; Maine, 9 votes; Maryland, 10 votes; Massachusetts, 15 votes; Mississippi, 3 votes; New Hampshire, 7 votes; New Jersey, 8 votes; New York, 29 votes; North Carolina, 15 votes; Pennsylvania, 28 votes; Rhode Island, 3 votes; South Carolina, 11 votes; Tennessee, 11 votes; Vermont, 7 votes.

Sanford—Kentucky, 7 votes; New York, 7 votes; Ohio, 16 votes.

Macon—Virginia, 24 votes.

Jackson—Connecticut, 8 votes; Maryland, 1 vote; Missouri, 3 votes;

New Hampshire, 1 vote.

Van Buren—Georgia, 9 votes.

Clay—Delaware, 2 votes.

6. The state-by-state vote for Calhoun was the same as for Democratic-Republican presidential candidate Jackson, except for Georgia, which cast 2 votes for Calhoun and 7 votes for Smith.

7. The state-by-state vote for Van Buren was the same as for Democratic-Republican presidential candidate Jackson, except for Pennsylvania, which cast 30 votes for Wilkins.

South Carolina cast 11 presidential electoral votes for Independent Democratic presidential candidate Floyd and 11 votes for Independent Democratic vice-presidential candidate Lee.

Vermont cast 7 presidential electoral votes for Anti-Masonic candidate Wirt and 7 vice-presidential electoral votes for Wirt's running mate, Ellmaker.

8. The state-by-state vote for Johnson was the same as for Democratic presidential candidate Van Buren, except for Virginia, which cast 23 votes for Smith.

Granger's state-by-state vote was the same as for Whig presidential candidate Harrison, except for Maryland and Massachusetts. Maryland cast 10 presidential electoral votes for Harrison and 10 vice-presidential votes for Tyler; Massachusetts cast 14 presidential electoral votes for Whig candidate Webster and 14 vice-presidential votes for Granger.

Tyler received 11 votes from Georgia, 10 from Maryland, 11 from South Carolina, and 15 from Tennessee.

No vice-presidential candidate received a majority of the electoral vote. As a result the Senate, for the only time in history, selected the vice president under the provisions of the Twelfth Amendment. Johnson was elected vice president by a vote of 33 to 16 over Granger.

9. The Democratic Party did not nominate a vice-presidential candidate in 1840. Johnson's state-by-state vote was the same as for presidential candidate Van Buren, except for South Carolina and Virginia. South Carolina cast 11 votes for Tazewell. Virginia cast 23 presidential electoral votes for Van Buren, 22 vice-presidential votes for Johnson, and 1 vice-presidential vote for Polk.

10. Liberal Republican and Democratic presidential candidate Horace Greeley died November 29, 1872. As a result eighteen electors pledged to Greeley cast their presidential electoral votes for Brown, Greeley's running mate.

The vice-presidential vote was as follows:

Brown—Georgia, 5 votes; Kentucky, 8 votes; Maryland, 8 votes; Missouri, 6 votes; Tennessee, 12 votes; Texas, 8 votes.

Colquitt—Georgia, 5 votes.

Palmer—Missouri, 3 votes.

Bramlette—Kentucky, 3 votes.

Groesbeck—Missouri, 1 vote.

Machen—Kentucky, 1 vote.

Julian—Missouri, 5 votes.

Banks—Georgia, 1 vote.

11. The state-by-state vote for Sewall was the same as for Democratic-Populist candidate William Jennings Bryan, except for the following states, which cast electoral votes for Watson: Arkansas, 3 votes; Louisiana, 4;

Missouri, 4; Montana, 1; Nebraska, 4; North Carolina, 5; South Dakota, 2; Utah, 1; Washington, 2; Wyoming, 1.

12. Butler received the 8 electoral votes of Vice President James Sherman, who died Oct. 30, 1912, after being renominated on the Republican ticket. Butler was named as the substitute candidate.

13. Democratic electors carried Alabama's 11 electoral votes. Five of the electors were pledged to the national Democratic ticket of Kennedy and Johnson. Six electors ran unpledged and voted for Harry F. Byrd for president and Strom Thurmond for vice president.

Mississippi's eight electors voted for Byrd and Thurmond.

In Oklahoma the Republican ticket of Nixon and Lodge carried the state, but Henry D. Irwin, one of the state's eight electors voted for Byrd for president and Goldwater for vice president.

14. Mike Padden, a Republican elector from the state of Washington cast his presidential electoral vote for Reagan instead of the Republican nominee, Ford. But he voted for Dole, Ford's running mate, for vice president. Dole thus received one more electoral vote than Ford.

15. Margaret Leach, a Democratic elector from West Virginia, cast her vice-presidential electoral vote for Dukakis, the Democratic nominee for president, and her presidential vote for his running mate, Bentsen.

16. Barbara Lett-Simmons, a Democratic elector from the District of Columbia, withheld her vice-presidential electoral vote for Lieberman (and presidential electoral vote for Gore).

17. Edwards received one more electoral vote for vice president than Democratic candidate John Kerry received for president due to an anonymous Minnesota elector who cast both presidential and vice-presidential votes for Edwards.

Biographical Directory of Presidential and Vice- Presidential Candidates

THE NAMES in the directory include all persons who have received electoral votes for president or vice president since 1789. Also included are prominent third-party candidates who received popular votes but no electoral votes, and Nelson A. Rockefeller, appointed vice president by Gerald R. Ford, who became president following the resignation of Richard Nixon.

The material is organized as follows: name, state of residence in the year(s) the individual received electoral votes, party or parties with which the individual identified when he or she received electoral votes, date of birth, date of death (where applicable), major offices held, and the year(s) of candidacy.

For the elections of 1789 through 1800, presidential electors did not vote separately for president or vice president. It was, therefore, difficult in many cases to determine if an individual receiving electoral votes in these elections was a candidate for the office of president or vice president. Where no determination could be made from the sources consulted by CQ Press, the year in which the individual received electoral votes is given with no specification as to whether the individual was a candidate for president or vice president.

Introduction

Americans elect a new Congress on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November of even-numbered years. Early the following January the elected representatives and senators begin their first session of that Congress. Those elected November 4, 2008, for instance, were sworn in January 6, 2009, the opening day of the 111th Congress. They included many new faces: nine new senators—with one seat still disputed—and fifty-four new representatives.

As an institution, Congress has suffered public criticism almost since the nation's beginnings. Alexis de Tocqueville, the astute French visitor of the late 1820s, observed the “vulgar demeanor” of the House of Representatives, where often he could not detect even one “distinguished man.” In contrast, as he wrote in his classic Democracy in America, the Senate was “composed of eloquent advocates, distinguished generals, wise magistrates, and statesmen of note, whose arguments would do honor to the most remarkable parliamentary debates of Europe.”

Subsequent views of the entire Congress often have been no more charitable than de Tocqueville's opinion of the House. Gallup polls measuring American's trust and confidence in governmental institutions show Congress consistently ranking last among the three branches of the federal government. In December 1998 Gallup found that 63 percent of the Americans questioned expressed “a great deal” or “fair amount” of confidence in the executive branch, and 78 percent in the judicial branch. Yet 61 percent of those Americans polled stated their trust and confidence in the legislative branch, up seven percentage points from May 1997. Related Gallup polls, asking whether Americans approve or disapprove of the way Congress is handling its job, have been volatile over the years. Approval of Congress reached a peak of 84 percent in October 2001, at a time of high support for government after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in New York City and at the Pentagon in Virginia. In contrast, Congress slid to an all-time low for Gallup polls in July 2008, with an approval rating of just 14 percent. These and other polls over longer periods suggest that many Americans often view the legislative branch with a skeptical eye. But paradoxically, election results show that voters generally return incumbents to office, indicating a more generous attitude among voters toward their representatives and senators than the institution as a whole.

In the modern era the power of incumbency has remained strong with the turnover rate from deaths, resignations, and election defeats averaging about 10 percent or less, historically an exceptionally low level. An incumbent's appeal rests on more than the person's record in Congress and is significantly influenced by the public image projected through television, direct mail, telephone banks, the Internet, and other devices used in election campaigns. But projecting that image, particularly through costly television advertising, is extremely expensive, requiring any candidate to raise substantial campaign funds. Incumbents are particularly well placed to raise money from special interest groups, whether business, labor, or ideological, as a result of their service in Congress and participation in important decisions that may affect the donors' organizations. This incumbency advantage generally tilts voter recognition toward the member and away from a challenger who often will have more difficulty raising money from the interest groups.

Incumbency at times has provided less protection, especially if one party is unpopular, the public disapproves of government in general, or voters are wary of repeatedly returning the same politicians to office. In the 1992 and 1994 congressional elections, for example, more than eighty incumbents lost reelection bids. Voters were increasingly wary of long-service incumbents, labeled “career politicians” by their critics. Many challengers ran antigovernment campaigns presenting their absence of previous elected office as a reason to be elected. Some challengers vowed to serve only a limited number of terms to avoid becoming “career politicians” out of touch with the voters, although some winners by the end of their pledged terms found reasons to stay in office.

In 1994 a landmark election swept Republicans to power in both chambers. Democrats had controlled either the House or Senate, and usually both, since 1955. Since 1933, when the Great Depression realigned political power, Republicans had managed to control both houses only twice—in the Eightieth Congress (1947–1949) and the Eighty-third Congress (1953–1955). Republicans also held a Senate majority from 1981 to 1987.

In 1996 the GOP maintained its majority, losing nine seats in the House, but gaining two in the Senate. It was the first time that the GOP had won a back-to-back majority in the House since the 1920s. By 2000, the power of incumbency had largely returned. In the House races that year, 97.8 percent of incumbents were reelected, only a fraction lower than in 1998. Although incumbency in the Senate was less powerful than in the House, nevertheless in the 2000 elections 79 percent of incumbents in that chamber won again.

The GOP held the House until the 2006 elections, and it kept a majority of the Senate for the same period except the 107th Congress. That Congress began in 2001 with a 50–50 split in the Senate, and the Democrats subsequently gained a narrow majority when Republican Jim Jeffords (Vt.) unexpectedly defected from his party to become an independent and caucus with Democrats.

In 2006, amid mounting public discontent with the presidency of George W. Bush and concern about the direction of the country, voters returned Democrats to power in both chambers. Prior to the elections, many analysts had expected the Republican majority in the House to persist for at least several more cycles because redistricting in 2000 had produced a majority of congressional districts that appeared to favor GOP candidates. Instead, Democrats gained thirty-one seats to capture the House with a 233–202 majority. In the Senate, they ousted six Republican incumbents to gain a bare majority of 51–49, including two independents who caucused with them. Even in a year with so much voter unrest, a majority of Republican incumbents won reelection. The success rate among House Republicans seeking reelection in 2006 was 89 percent; the reelection rate for Republican senators was an unusually low 57 percent.

Two years later, the Democrats again had a banner year. With the nation facing serious economic troubles and Barack Obama winning a substantial victory in the presidential race, House Democrats extended their majority to 257 seats, picking up a net of twenty-one seats. In the Senate, Democrats picked up eight seats in the November voting, Republicans none. Democrats plus the two independents who supported them reached fifty-nine seats, one short of the sixty needed to cut off filibusters. A Pennsylvania Republican, Arlen Specter, later switched to the Democrats, giving the party sixty votes.

Due to the unusually high turnover, a slight majority of House members—almost 230—had served eight years or less at the beginning of the 111th Congress. These members had never served during a Democratic administration, gone through a prolonged economic downturn, or experienced much time when terrorism was not a high-priority threat. The situation was little different in the Senate, where forty-six members were first elected to that body in 2001 or later.

CHARACTERISTICS OF MEMBERS

Whether the turnover is large or small, a certain uniformity pervades Congress. Congress has been dominated since its inception by middle-aged white men with backgrounds in law or business. Their levels of income and education have consistently been above the national average. But for many of the lawmakers today, business occupations are past activities. In recent years, ethics rules have limited the income that can be earned outside of Congress. Moreover, serving in Congress has become a full-time job. Since the 1970s Congress has attracted career politicians, whose primary earnings have come from government service.

Ever so slowly, other changes also have crept into the makeup of Congress. The numbers of women, African American, Asian, and Hispanic American members have increased in recent decades, although still not in proportion to their share of the total population. Of the 535 members at the beginning of the 111th Congress in 2009, ninety-two were women, thirty-nine were black, twenty-seven were Hispanic, eight were of Asian or Pacific Island descent, and one was of Native American heritage. In addition, of the six nonvoting delegates sent to the House, three were women, two were black, one was Hispanic, and two were of Pacific Island descent. However, progress for minorities has been halting, particularly in the Senate.

Average Age

The average age of members of Congress went up substantially between the post-Civil War period and the 1950s but remained fairly constant until the mid-1970s. In the Forty-first Congress (1869–1871), the average was 44.6 years; by the Eighty-fifth Congress (1957–1959), it was 53.8. During the next eighteen years, the average fluctuated only slightly. But when the Ninety-fourth Congress met in January 1975, the average age dropped to 50.9 years. The difference was made in the House, where ninety-two freshmen members reduced the average age of representatives to 49.8 years, the first time since World War II that the average in either chamber had fallen below 50. The Ninety-sixth Congress (1979–1981) was the youngest since 1949; the overall average age for both chambers had slipped to 49.5 years. It dropped again in January 1981, when the House had eight members under thirty, the most since World War II. The younger trend bottomed out in 1983 when the average hit 47.0 years.

During the next twenty years the average age climbed gradually, reaching a record high 58.2 years at the start of 111th Congress in 2009. (See Table 20-1, p. 909.) That aging trend was partly attributable to the aging trend of the nation's population. But low turnover in Congress was also a big factor. The youngest Congress of the 1990s was the 104th when the Republicans took control. The average age in January 1995 was 52.2, with House members averaging 50.9 years. By January 2009 the average age had risen to 57.0 in the House and 63.1 in the Senate—both record highs.

Occupations

The legal profession was long the dominant occupational background of members of Congress since its beginning. In the First Congress, more than one-third of the House members had legal training. The proportion of members with a legal background crested at 70 percent in 1840 but remained high. From 1950 to the mid-1970s it was in the 55–60 percent range.

The first significant decline in members with a law background began with the 96th Congress. Although sixty-five of the 100 senators were lawyers in 1979, lawyers in the House made up less than a majority for the first time in at least thirty years. The situation continued through the 1990s. When the 109th Congress convened in January 2005, 178 representatives and sixty-four senators were lawyers, or about 45 percent of both chambers. For the first time, business or banking, which had long been the second most listed category by members, overtook law in 2005. In the 109th Congress, 205 representatives and forty senators claimed a business or banking background, or nearly 46 percent.

However, another category (some members listed overlapping backgrounds) topped both law and business in 2005 and highlighted the trend toward career politicians. In the 109th Congress, 254 members, or 47 percent, listed backgrounds in public service or politics. Additionally, out of the 535 members, 274—more than half—had previous experience as state legislators. This trend became possible when states and localities in the 1970s began to think of political positions as full-time jobs and raised salaries accordingly. Moreover, the demands of modern political campaigns have left less time for the pursuit of other careers.

A new breed of legislator emerged in the 1970s: the career politician whose primary earnings had always come from political office at the local, state, or federal level. This trend became possible because states and localities had begun to think of political positions as full-time jobs and had raised salaries accordingly. In addition, the demands of modern political campaigns left less time for the pursuit of other careers. This trend continued through the following decades. In the 109th Congress 72 percent of new House members and 88 percent of new senators had held prior office. The Senate class included several experienced former House members. A few years earlier, in the 107th Congress, only 64 percent of new senators had held office previously.

The number of members with military experience declined dramatically into the twenty-first century. At the start of the 91st Congress in 1969, 73 percent of members were military veterans. By 1991 the percentage of veterans in Congress dropped to 52 percent. At the start of the 111th Congress in 2009, only 119, or 22 percent, cited military service. This in part reflected the advent of the all-volunteer army in 1973.

Law is generally the predominant profession for lawmakers, with 206 members in the 111th Congress listing that as their occupation. Other fields represented by members of the 111th Congress included real estate (forty-one), agriculture (thirty-one), medicine/physician (nineteen), and journalism (twelve). Members of the clergy continue to be underrepresented in Congress. Only a handful of Protestant ministers have served in Congress, and no Catholic priest had done so until 1971, when Rep. Robert F. Drinan, D-Mass., a Jesuit, took a House seat. (Father Gabriel Richard was the nonvoting delegate of the Territory of Michigan from 1823 to 1825.) Father Drinan did not seek a sixth term in 1980 after Pope John Paul II that year ordered priests not to hold public office. The pope's directive also prompted Robert J.

Cornell, a Catholic priest and former House member, to halt his political comeback bid in Wisconsin. Cornell, a Democrat elected in 1974, served two terms before he was defeated in 1978. Only four members of the House listed their occupation as clergy in the 111th Congress.

Religious Affiliations

Among religious groups, Protestants have made up nearly three-fourths of the membership of both houses in recent years. However, Roman Catholics form the biggest single religious group—a distinction they have held since taking the lead from Methodists in 1965. At the beginning of the 111th Congress, Roman Catholics made up the largest religious group in both chambers with a total of 156.

Among Protestant denominations, Baptists were most numerous (sixty-four), followed by Methodists (fifty-four), Presbyterians (forty-three), Episcopalians (thirty-six), and Lutherans (twenty-two). There were forty-five Jewish members. The diversity of religious affiliations expanded in 2006, with the elections of two Buddhists and one Muslim. In all, members in the 111th Congress listed affiliations with some twenty-three religious groups. Forty-six simply listed “Protestant,” and only six did not specify a religious preference.

WOMEN IN CONGRESS

A total of 259 women had been elected or appointed to Congress as of March 1, 2009, shortly after the 111th Congress began. Of these, 255 served with voting rights in either the Senate or House; four other women were elected as non-voting delegates from the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, Guam, and Hawaii before it became a state. Of the 255, 217 served in the House only, thirty served in the Senate only, and eight served in both chambers. The women include twenty-seven African-Americans, seven Hispanic-Americans, and four Asian-Americans.

The first woman to be a member of Congress was Rep. Jeannette Rankin, R-Mont., elected in 1916. Her state gave women the right to vote before the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution enfranchising women was ratified in 1920. The climb in women’s membership had been long and slow. Rankin’s election was not followed by a surge of women members, even after women received the vote. The first notable increase came in the 71st Congress (1929–31), when nine women served in the House. The number had scarcely more than doubled by the 87th Congress (1961–63), when twenty women—two senators and eighteen representatives—were members.

Women’s membership declined slightly after that and did not reach twenty again until the 95th Congress (1977–79). The total went down to seventeen in the next Congress but was up to twenty-one in the 97th Congress (1981–83). Since then, the number has increased in all but one Congress (when the total remained the same as in the previous Congress). (See Table 20-2, below.)

NOTE: House totals reflect the number of members at the start of each Congress and exclude nonvoting delegates.

The elections of 1992 saw a large jump in the numbers of women running for and being elected to Congress. The 103rd Congress, which opened in 1993, included forty-eight women in the House, an increase of nineteen, and seven in the Senate, an increase of four.

Several factors contributed to the success of women candidates in 1992. Many capitalized on an unusually large number of retirements to run in open seats. Women also benefited from reapportionment, which created dozens of opportunities for newcomers in the South and West. Another factor was public dissatisfaction with Congress, which allowed women to portray themselves positively as outsiders. The Senate’s questioning of law professor Anita F. Hill’s accusations of sexual harassment in the 1991 confirmation hearings of Supreme Court justice Clarence Thomas also had an impact. The televised image of an all-male Senate Judiciary panel sharply questioning Hill brought home dramatically to many women their lack of representation in Congress.

The 111th Congress opened in 2009 with an all-time high of ninety-two women (seventy-five in the House—not including three nonvoting delegates—and seventeen in the Senate).

Several women have served out unexpired terms of less than one year. Rebecca L. Felton, the first woman to serve in the Senate, did so for only one day. Felton, a Georgia Democrat, was appointed October 1, 1922, to fill the Senate vacancy created by the death of Thomas E. Watson. She was not sworn in until November 21, and the next day yielded her seat to Walter F. George, who had meanwhile been elected to fill the vacancy.

Gladys Pyle, a South Dakota Republican, was elected November 9, 1938, to fill the unexpired term of Rep. Peter Norbeck, who died in office. But his term ended the following January 3 before Congress convened and thus Pyle never took the oath of office.

Certainly the most prominent woman to be elected to the Senate was first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, who won election in 2000 in New York as her husband was completing his second term as president. This marked the first time that a first lady ever served in either chamber. After winning reelection in 2006, Clinton resigned her seat in 2009 to become Barack Obama's secretary of state. The governor of New York appointed Kirsten Gillibrand, a member of the House of Representatives, to the seat.

The Widow's Mandate

In many jurisdictions it became customary for the officeholder's party to run his widow for the seat in the hope of tapping a sympathy vote. Sometimes she filled the office by brief appointment until the governor or party leaders could agree on a candidate.

The "widow's mandate," as such, marked the beginning of political careers for some women. Edith Nourse Rogers, a Massachusetts Republican, entered the House after her husband died in 1925 and remained there until her death in 1960. Margaret Chase Smith filled her late husband's House seat in 1940 and went on to serve four terms in the Senate (1949–1973). Hattie W. Caraway, an Arkansas Democrat, who was appointed to the Senate seat of her late husband in 1931, was returned to Congress by Arkansas voters in 1932 and 1938.

Rep. Charlotte T. Reid, R-Ill., and Rep. Marilyn Lloyd, D-Tenn., became their parties' nominees when their husbands died between the primary and general elections (in 1962 and 1974, respectively). As women have become more active in politics at all levels, the congressional tradition of the widow's mandate has weakened.

Still, widows of congressmen have continued to win office. Jo Ann Emerson, R-Mo., won a special election in 1996 to fill out the term of her husband, Bill Emerson. Two years later, Republican Mary Bono won the California seat that had been held by her husband, former pop singer Sonny Bono, who was killed in a skiing accident. Lois Capps, D-Calif., in 1998 won the Santa Barbara district of her husband, Walter Capps, who died in 1997. Rep. Doris Matsui (D-Calif.) joined the Congress in 2005 after the death of her husband, former Rep. Robert Matsui.

Perhaps the most unusual case was that of Democrat Jean Carnahan of Missouri, who was appointed to a Senate seat in 2001 that was won on November 7, 2000, by her husband, Missouri governor Mel Carnahan, who died three weeks earlier in a plane crash. She later lost the 2002 special election to fill the remaining four years of the seat's term.

Marriages have also linked members of Congress. Rep. Emily Taft Douglas, D-Ill., was elected to Congress in 1944, four years before her husband, Sen. Paul H. Douglas, D-Ill. Another woman, Rep. Martha Keys, D-Kan., married Rep. Andrew Jacobs, D-Ind., in 1976. This marriage between colleagues was the first of its kind in congressional history. Rep. Olympia J. Snowe, R-Maine, in 1989 married Maine governor John R. McKernan Jr., a former U.S. representative. Rep. Marjorie Margolies-Mezvinsky, D-Pa., was the wife of former Iowa representative Edward M. Mezvinsky when she was elected to Congress in 1992. Reps. Susan Molinari, R-N.Y., and Bill Paxon, R-N.Y., were married in 1994. Nancy Landon Kassebaum (R-Kan.), married former senator Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) after she left office in 1997. Sen. Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.), elected in 2002, was the wife of former senate majority leader Robert J. "Bob" Dole (R-Kan.). In 2007 Niki Tsongas, the widow of Sen. Paul Tsongas, became the first woman to win a congressional seat from Massachusetts in a quarter-century.

Molinari earned another distinction as one of the few women in Congress who were daughters of representatives. She won the Staten Island seat of her father, Rep. Guy Molinari, who left the House to become Staten Island borough president. California Democrat Lucille Roybal-Allard also shared that distinction by winning the House seat of her father, Edward R. Roybal, whose congressional career lasted thirty years. But the most prominent woman representative in this category was California Democrat Nancy Pelosi, who entered the House in 1987 and rose to become Speaker in 2007. She was the daughter of Thomas J. D'Alesandro Jr., a House member from 1939 to 1947 and then mayor of Baltimore.

Progress in the Senate

From 1922 to 1992, only sixteen women served in the Senate, and all but four claimed their seats by means of the widow's mandate. The four elected to full Senate terms were Maurine B. Neuberger, D-Ore. (1960), Nancy Landon Kassebaum, R-Kan. (1978, 1984, 1990), Paula Hawkins, R-Fla. (1980), and Barbara A. Mikulski, D-Md. (1986– ). Kassebaum was the first woman ever elected to the Senate without being preceded in Congress by her husband.

In 1992 six women were elected to full Senate terms, and the number of women senators continued to increase after that. By the beginning of the 111th Congress in 2009 all seventeen women serving in the Senate were elected to full terms. Three states—California, Maine, and Washington—were represented in the Senate solely by women: Democrats Barbara Boxer and Dianne Feinstein from California, Republicans Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins from Maine, and Democrats Patty Murray and Maria E. Cantwell from Washington.

In 1992 the first African American woman was elected to the Senate, Democrat Carol Moseley Braun of Illinois. She served in the state legislature from 1979–1988, where she rose to become the first woman assistant majority leader. The outrage over the Senate’s handling of the Thomas confirmation hearings propelled Moseley Braun into the 1992 Illinois Senate race. She lost her bid for reelection in 1998.

Leadership Positions

Until the beginning of the twenty-first century, women found it difficult to move to the top of the committee and party leadership ladders even though they were entering Congress in record numbers. A major breakthrough came in 2003, when Democrats elected Nancy Pelosi as their party leader, making her the first woman elected leader by either party. She defeated Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. by 177–29. Pelosi had set up her victory with another decisive win, in 2002, over Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), in a race for House Democratic whip. After the Democrats won a majority in the House in the 2006 elections, the House elected Pelosi to Speaker on January 3, 2007, by a vote of 233–202, over Republican John Boehner of Ohio.

Even before Pelosi, women from time to time won election to Republican and Democratic leadership positions in the House and Senate. The first elected to a leadership position, Chase Going Woodhouse of Connecticut, became secretary of the House Democratic Caucus in 1949. Lynn Martin became the first Republican woman elected to a House leadership position when she won the vice chair post in the Republican Conference in 1985. Eighteen years later, Deborah Pryce of Ohio became chair of the Republican Conference. In the Senate, Margaret Chase Smith was the first woman to hold a leadership position, chairing the Senate Republican Conference from 1967 to 1973.

In 1995 Nancy Landon Kassebaum became the first woman to chair a major Senate committee, Labor and Human Resources. She was joined in the House by fellow Kansas Republican Jan Meyers, who chaired the Small Business Committee. Before Meyers, no woman had chaired a full House committee since 1977, when Merchant Marine Committee Chair Leonor K. Sullivan, D-Mo., left Congress. Mae Ella Nolan, a California Republican who served from 1923 to 1925, was the first woman to chair a congressional committee; she headed the House Committee on Expenditures in the Post Office Department.

In 1989 Barbara Mikulski became the first woman to chair a Senate Appropriations subcommittee, the Veterans Affairs, HUD and Related Agencies subcommittee. She became its ranking minority member when the GOP took control of the Senate in 1995. When the Senate unexpectedly switched to Democratic control in June 2001, Mikulski became the chair again. Three other Democratic women were also elevated to chairs of Senate Appropriations subcommittees after the 2001 changeover: Dianne Feinstein of California, Mary Landrieu of Louisiana, and Patty Murray of Washington.

Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., speaks about the economic crisis in September 2008. Pelosi became the first female House Speaker.

On the House Appropriations Committee, Barbara Vucanovich, R-Nev., chaired the Military Construction Subcommittee in the 104th Congress. In the 110th Congress, seven women chaired appropriations subcommittees in the House and Senate.

Congress has been an important starting point for women seeking national office. Shirley Chisholm, a Democratic representative from New York, ran for president in 1972. Geraldine Ferraro, another New York Democrat who served in the House, was her party's vice-presidential nominee in 1984, another first. Former Illinois senator Carol Moseley Braun was among the crowd of Democratic challengers in 2004. In 2008 Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton narrowly lost the Democratic nomination to Obama.

BLACKS IN CONGRESS

In 135 years, from 1870 to 2009, 118 black Americans served in Congress—six in the Senate and 112 in the House. (See Table 20-3, p. 916.) John W. Menard holds the distinction of being the first black person elected to Congress. But his 1868 election in Louisiana was disputed and the House denied him a seat in the Fortieth Congress. Hiram R. Revels of Mississippi, who filled an unexpired Senate term from February 1870 to March 1871, thus became the first black person to serve in Congress. The first black person to serve in the House was Joseph H. Rainey of South Carolina, from December 1870 to March 1879.

Menard, Revels, and Rainey were elected during the post-Civil War Reconstruction era (1865–1877), when many white voters were disenfranchised and Confederate veterans were barred from holding office. During that period sixteen black men were sent to Congress from Alabama, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina. But from the end of Reconstruction until the end of the century, only seven black men were elected to Congress, all from the Carolinas and Virginia. They, as with their predecessors, were Republicans.

As federal controls were lifted in the South, literacy tests, poll taxes, and sometimes violence eroded black voting rights. From the time Blanche K. Bruce of Mississippi left the Senate in 1881, no other black person served in that body until Edward W. Brooke, R-Mass., did from 1967–1979. In 1992 Illinois Democrat Carol Moseley Braun was elected to the Senate, becoming the first black woman to gain a Senate seat. She served one term, losing her reelection bid in 1998.

Brought to national prominence by his rousing keynote speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention in Boston, Barack Obama of Illinois that same year became the third African American popularly elected to the Senate. For four years Obama was the sole black in the chamber until he resigned his seat in November 2008 after becoming the first African American to win the presidency. The governor of Illinois subsequently picked an African American, Roland W. Burris, a former Illinois attorney general, to take the Senate seat in January 2009.

The last black person elected to the House in the nineteenth century was Republican George Henry White of North Carolina; he was elected in 1896 and 1898 but did not seek renomination in 1900. For nearly three decades there were no black members of Congress—not until Oscar De Priest, R-Ill., entered the House in 1929 and served three terms. During the next quarter-century only three other blacks were elected to Congress: Arthur W. Mitchell in 1934, William L. Dawson in 1942, and Adam Clayton Powell Jr., in 1944. All three represented big-city black constituencies, in Chicago (Mitchell and Dawson) and New York (Powell).

Moreover, all three were Democrats, reflecting a switch in black voting habits. President Franklin D. Roosevelt had pulled a majority of black voters away from the party of Abraham Lincoln into a coalition of Depression-era urban laborers, farmers, and intellectuals. Mitchell, the first black Democrat elected to the House, was brought in by the Democratic sweep in the 1934 election.

That election also removed the Republican, De Priest, and marked the beginning of a fifty-six-year absence of black representation among House Republicans. That drought was broken in November 1990 when Connecticut elected Gary Franks, a black Republican real-estate investor from Waterbury who had once captained Yale's basketball team. Franks was defeated for reelection in 1996.

House Democrats, in contrast, steadily gained black members. Only two were added in the 1950s—Charles C. Diggs Jr., D-Mich., and Robert N.C. Nix, D-Pa.—but after that the pace quickened. Five more were elected in the 1960s, and fourteen each in the 1970s and 1980s. The number of black Americans elected to Congress more than doubled during the 1990s—thirty-six were elected to the House—all but two Democrats—and one (Mosley Braun) to the Senate.

In 2004, Barack Obama, D-Ill., became the third African American popularly elected senator since Reconstruction. Here he meets with Karl Rove in January 2005.

The Supreme Court's "one-person, one-vote" rulings in the early 1960s, ratification of the Twenty-fourth Amendment in 1964, and congressional passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act are credited with opening up the polls to black voters as never before. The Voting Rights Act provided for federal oversight in jurisdictions where black registration and voting was exceptionally low; the Twenty-fourth Amendment outlawed poll taxes and similar restrictions on voting; and the courts eventually ended a southern practice of diluting black voting power by gerrymandering voting districts. As black voter turnouts increased, so did black representation in Congress.

In 1968 Rep. Shirley Chisholm, D-N.Y., became the first black woman to be elected to Congress. She was joined in the House by Yvonne Brathwaite Burke, D-Calif., and Barbara C. Jordan, D-Texas, who both served from 1973 until 1979. In a 1973 special election, Cardiss Collins won the House seat previously held by her late husband, George W. Collins. Next came Katie Hall, D-Ind., the winner of a special election in November 1982, followed by two victors in the November 1990 general election, Maxine Waters, D-Calif., and Barbara-Rose Collins, D-Mich.

Jordan and Andrew Young, D-Ga., both elected in 1972, were the first blacks in the twentieth century to go to Congress from states of the Old Confederacy. Both Georgia and Texas later sent other black representatives, who were joined by black House members from Tennessee (Harold E. Ford Jr.), Mississippi (Mike Espy), and Louisiana (William J. Jefferson).

The 103rd Congress (1993–1995) had included several firsts for black Americans. In addition to Moseley Braun becoming the first black woman ever elected to the Senate, for the first time since the Reconstruction era, the House delegations from Alabama, Florida, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia included black members. Georgia elected its first black woman representative, Cynthia McKinney. The dramatic gains for African Americans in the 1992 elections were in large measure a result of redistricting aimed at increasing minority strength in Congress—a legacy of the civil rights era. This effort to draw so-called minority-majority districts, however, came under attack as the decade of the 1990s wore on. By the end of the decade, however, the Supreme Court in several decisions set new standards that limited this method of increasing black representation in Congress.

The new generation of African Americans elected to Congress in the 1990s reflected the changes begun during the civil rights era. Many came to Congress with considerable experience in state legislatures and other local government positions. Bobby L. Rush of Illinois, a leader of the Black Panther movement during the 1960s, had served for a decade on the Chicago city council. Earl F. Hilliard, Alabama's first black representative since Reconstruction, was an eighteen-year veteran of his state's legislature. Cynthia McKinney had been a member of the Georgia state legislature, and Corrine Brown had served in the Florida legislature. In a 1995 special election, Jesse L. Jackson Jr., whose father, the Rev. Jesse Jackson Sr., was a civil rights crusader and two-time Democratic presidential contender, was elected from Illinois. He was thirty-one years old when he was sent to Congress. In 1996 Julia Carson of Indiana won the seat of her former boss, Democrat Andrew Jacobs Jr., and became the first black to represent Indianapolis in the House. She had served in both the Indiana House and Senate. Carolyn Cheeks Kilpatrick, another African American woman, won her House seat after serving seventeen years in the Michigan House. In 1998 the Cleveland district seat of retiring black Rep. Louis Stokes was won by African American Democrat Stephanie Tubbs Jones, a judge and prosecutor in Cuyahoga County.

As the number of black Americans continued to increase in the House, those elected earlier gained seniority and, in some instances, committee chairmanships. Dawson served as chair of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments (later renamed the Government Operations Committee) from 1949 until his death in 1970 (except for 1953–1955 when the Republicans controlled the House). Other notable black chairs included Powell (Education and Labor Committee, 1961–1967); William H. Gray III, D-Pa. (Budget Committee, 1985–1989); Augustus F. Hawkins, D-Calif. (Education and Labor, 1984–1991); and Louis Stokes, D-Ohio (Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, 1987–1989, and Standards of Official Conduct, 1981–1985, 1991–1993).

In 1989 Democrats elected Gray to majority whip, the third-highest ranking job in the House. Gray held the post until 1991 when he resigned from Congress to become president of the United Negro College Fund. In 1991 Rep. John Lewis, D-Ga., a veteran of the civil rights movement, moved up into the House Democratic leadership as a chief deputy whip.

By the end of the century, a few black members of Congress had served in the House for more than twenty-five years. California Democrat Ronald V. Dellums, who retired from the House in the 105th Congress after fourteen terms, served as chair of the Armed Services Committee in the 103rd Congress. In the 106th Congress, William L. Clay of Missouri, a former chair of the Post Office and Civil service Committee, served as the ranking member on the Education and Workforce Committee. He retired at the end of that Congress.

In the 111th Congress, several black Democratic lawmakers held powerful positions in the House. They included James Clyburn of South Carolina, who became the Democratic whip in 2006; Charles B. Rangel of New York, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee; and John Conyers Jr. of Michigan, chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

In 2009, at the beginning of the 111th Congress, all thirty-nine black members of Congress served in the House, and they all came from one political party. The Congressional Black Caucus had been consisted entirely of Democrats since the retirement at the end of the 107th Congress of J.C. Watts of Oklahoma, a former professional football player and youth minister who was elected secretary of the House Republican Conference. In addition, Democrats Eleanor Holmes Norton of the District of Columbia and Donna M.C. Christensen of the Virgin Islands were elected as nonvoting delegates.

Despite the steady gains of blacks being elected to Congress and the growing power of senior black members, African Americans remained numerically underrepresented in Congress. In 2009 they made up about 12 percent of the population, but only about 7 percent of the House and 1 percent of the Senate.

Redistricting Battles

Following the 1990 census, many states redrew congressional district lines under the provisions of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which required that interests of minority voters be protected. Districts in which minorities made up a majority of the voting age population were known as majority-minority districts. As state mapmakers pulled districts this way and that to pick up minority voters, many old boundaries were moved. In some states, oddly shaped majority-minority districts emerged.

Congressional remapping that went to extreme lengths to elect minorities quickly came under scrutiny by the Supreme Court. In 1993 in Shaw v. Reno, the Court ruled against North Carolina's bizarrely shaped majority-minority districts, inviting a new round of lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of districts drawn to ensure the election of minorities. Two years later in Miller v. Johnson, the Court struck down a Georgia redistricting plan that created three black-majority districts. The Court cast heavy doubt on any district lines for which race was the "predominant factor." In 1995 a panel of three federal judges imposed a new plan that reduced the black population share to about one-third in two of the districts.

Even though the black-majority 11th District in Georgia was invalidated by the Supreme Court decision, Cynthia A. McKinney, the district's black representative, scored a comfortable victory in 1996 in the newly drawn white-majority 4th District. Only one-third of the new district's voting age population was black, compared with 64 percent in her old district. In fact, all three of Georgia's black Democrats in the House were reelected to redrawn districts in 1996. Moreover, McKinney won again in 1998 and 2000 in the redrawn district.

The thrust of the Court's opinions threatened those who defended majority-minority districts as a way to empower minority voters. But the justices did not make sweeping determinations affecting all such districts; they seemed inclined to carve out new limits in a sequence of slightly different cases. After the 2000 census the majority-minority district issue became less contentious as the focus switched to partisan redistricting. (See Chapter 22, Reapportionment and Redistricting.)

HISPANICS IN CONGRESS

The rapidly expanding Hispanic American population was expected to become a powerful voting bloc in Congress but by 2009 the group remained significantly underrepresented. At the start of the 111th Congress that year, twenty-seven members and one nonvoting delegate from Puerto Rico identified themselves as Hispanics—people of Spanish ancestry. (See Table 20-4, p. 917.)

Twenty-four of the Hispanic members served in the House, and three in the Senate. Twenty-three were Democrats. Several Hispanic lawmakers in the House occupied powerful positions, including Xavier Becerra of California, vice-chair of the Democratic caucus; Silvestre Reyes, chairman of the Intelligence Committee, and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida, ranking Republican on the Foreign Affairs Committee.

However, the 2000 census showed the nation's Hispanic population continuing to grow rapidly, to 12.5 percent of the population—35.3 million persons—up from 9 percent a decade earlier. If Hispanics were represented proportionally in Congress they would hold sixty-seven seats. Hispanic voter turnouts traditionally have fallen well below the national average, which group activists attribute to poverty, lack of education, language barriers, alienation resulting from discrimination, and large numbers of young people.

As of January 2009, a total of fifty-one Hispanics had served in Congress—two in the Senate, three in both the Senate and House, and forty-six in the House. Several other Hispanics represented territories as nonvoting delegates or resident commissioners. The 111th Congress included Pedro Pierluisi, the resident commissioner of Puerto Rico.

The growth of Hispanic representation in the House was in large part the result of judicial interpretations of the Voting Rights Act requiring that minorities be given maximum opportunity to elect members of their own group to Congress. After the 1990 census, congressional district maps in states with significant Hispanic populations were redrawn with the aim of sending more Hispanics to Congress, a goal accomplished in the 1992 elections. Before the 1992 elections, there were only thirteen Hispanic members of Congress.

In 2004 two Hispanics won election to the Senate: Republican Mel Martinez of Florida and Democrat Ken Salazar of Colorado. Salazar succeeded Republican Ben Nighthorse Campbell, who had been the only Native American in the Senate. Salazar's brother, John Salazar, D-Colo., also began serving in the House in 2005, making the brothers one of three pairs serving in Congress. Ken Salazar resigned in 2009 to become President Barack Obama's secretary of the interior.

A second Hispanic pair of brothers were Republicans Lincoln Diaz-Balart and Mario Diaz-Balart, both of Florida. Two other Hispanic siblings, Linda Sanchez and Loretta Sanchez, both Democrats from California, made history in 2003 when they became the first sisters ever to serve in Congress. Prior to 2004, no Hispanic Senate candidates had been elected since 1970 when Joseph Montoya won his second and last term. Dennis Chavez, his fellow Democrat from New Mexico, was the first Hispanic to serve in the Senate (1935–1962).

Rep. Romualdo Pacheco, R-Calif., was the only Hispanic to serve in Congress during the nineteenth century.

1. Democrat Ken Salazar of Colorado, a member of the Senate when the 111th Congress convened, resigned on Jan. 21, 2009, to become secretary of the Interior. His replacement, appointed by the Colorado governor, was not Hispanic.

Mexican-born, with an English stepfather and an English education, Pacheco helped to bridge the cultural gap between the Spanish-speaking settlers of California and the newly arrived Americans. After California was taken from Mexico and given statehood, Pacheco moved upward in a succession of political offices to the governorship in 1875, filling out the term of his predecessor, who resigned to become a U.S. senator.

The next year Pacheco ran for Congress and was certified the victor in a disputed election and took his seat early in 1877. But the House subsequently decided that his opponent was the rightful winner. Pacheco returned home and ran again—successfully—twice more. After leaving Congress he became ambassador to Honduras and then Guatemala. No other Hispanic American was elected to Congress until 1912. After that, only in 1927–1931 and 1941–1943 was Congress without any Hispanic American members.

TURNOVER IN MEMBERSHIP

Congress experienced high turnover rates in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, principally in the House. The Senate experienced more stability because its members were elected for six-year terms and because state legislatures tended to send the same men to the Senate time after time. The Senate's turnover rate began to increase only after the popular election of senators was instituted by the Seventeenth Amendment in 1913. In the middle decades of the twentieth century, congressional turnover held steady at a relatively low rate. For a quarter-century after World War II each Congress had an average of about seventy-eight new members. An increase began in the 1970s; more than one hundred new members entered Congress in 1975. Turnover remained fairly high through the early 1980s, and then came a spell of strong incumbency and relatively low turnover that lasted through the 1990 election.

The 1988 election brought only thirty-three new faces to the House and ten to the Senate, the smallest turnover in history, both numerically and as a share (8 percent) of total membership. Another small turnover followed in 1990; the combined turnover for both chambers, including retirement, amounted to just 10 percent. The 1990 Senate incumbent reelection rate of 96.9 percent was the highest since direct elections began in 1914.

Several factors contributed to the turnover rates in the 1970s and early 1980s. The elections of 1972 and 1974 were affected by redistricting that followed the 1970 census; many House veterans retired rather than face strong new opposition. Those two elections also were the first in which eighteen-year-olds could vote. Probably the chief reason for change in 1974 was the Watergate scandal, which put an end to the Nixon administration and badly damaged the Republican Party. Democrats gained forty-three seats in the House that year, and the following January seventy-five of the ninety-two freshman representatives in the Ninety-fourth Congress were Democrats.

Most of those Democrats managed to hold their seats in the 1976 elections. The upheavals in that year's voting were in Senate races. Eighteen new senators took their oath of office in January 1977, marking the Senate's largest turnover since 1959.

An even larger Senate turnover came in the 1978 elections. It resulted in a 1979 freshman class of twenty senators, the biggest since the twenty-three member class of 1947. In 1978 ten incumbent senators retired, more than in any year since World War II. Three other incumbents were beaten in primaries, the most in a decade. Seven more were defeated for reelection, the second-highest number in twenty years. In the House a record fifty-eight seats were opened by retirement, death, primary defeat, and other causes. Moreover, nineteen incumbents fell in the general election, giving the House seventy-seven freshmen when the Ninety-sixth Congress opened in January 1979.

In 1980, when Republican Ronald Reagan won the White House, the GOP took control of the Senate for the first time since 1957, ending the longest one-party dominance in that body in its history. They also netted thirty-three House seats, the biggest Republican gain since 1966. But the Democrats made a comeback in the 1982 midterm elections: of the eighty-one new representatives, fifty-seven were Democrats. Republicans lost twenty-six seats in the House, half of them held by freshmen.

As in the early 1970s, redistricting was an important factor in the 1982 election. The 1980 census shifted seventeen seats from the Northeast and Midwest to the Sun Belt states of the South and West. Democrats took ten of these seats despite the Sun Belt's propensity to vote for Republican presidential candidates.

In 1984, a presidential election year, Republicans gained fourteen House seats and Democrats two Senate seats in an election that resulted in little turnover. Forty-three new representatives and seven new senators entered the Ninety-ninth Congress. On only four previous occasions since 1914 had there been fewer than ten Senate newcomers. In 1986 Democrats regained control of the Senate, electing eleven of the thirteen freshmen senators.

The 1986 House elections were extraordinarily good for incumbents of both parties. Only six House members lost in the general election; two others had been defeated in the primaries. But enough seats were open from retirement and death to yield a freshman House class of fifty members—twenty-three Republicans and twenty-seven Democrats.

In 1988 George H. W. Bush became the first Republican in sixty years to hold the White House for his party for a third consecutive term. But he also became the first candidate since John F. Kennedy in 1960 to win the presidential election while his party lost seats (three) in the House. Again in 1990, for the third straight election, Democrats gained House seats (nine). That feat had not been accomplished since the string of Democratic victories in 1954, 1956, and 1958.

In the presidential election year of 1992, voters opted to give the Democrats a chance to run both Congress and the White House by electing Democrat Bill Clinton, the former governor of Arkansas, as president. Clinton was elected with only 43 percent of the popular vote over George H. W. Bush and independent candidate H. Ross Perot. Not since Democrat Jimmy Carter had relinquished the White House to Republican Reagan in 1981 had Congress been controlled by the president's party.

Heading into the 1992 campaign, there was grumbling that the American political system had lost its capacity for renewal—low turnover in the 1980s fostered a perception of Congress as an incumbency club, fueled by special interest cash that nearly always defeated any challengers. But 1992 redistricting as a result of the 1990 census dramatically reshaped many districts, prodding some members into retirement and forcing others to run in unfamiliar constituencies. Reports of lax management and overdrawn checks at the House Bank also contributed to a high congressional turnover.

All this tumult resulted in 110 new members entering the House in January 1993, an influx of freshmen exceeding

LIMITING TERMS

A push for term limits for elected officials became popular in the early 1990s at a time of considerable public dissatisfaction with the federal and some state governments. Both the House and Senate, however, failed to pass a constitutional amendment limiting the terms of members of Congress. By the early twenty-first century, much of the initial support for term limits at the national level had faded, although states and many localities continued to impose limits on offices from governors to mayors to city councils.

In fact, many members who once campaigned on term limits had their enthusiasm cool for the idea once in office. Former Rep. George Nethercutt (R-Wash.), who had toppled Speaker Tom Foley (D-Wash.) in 1994 while promising to limit his own service to three terms, reneged on his term-limits pledge in 2000, saying, “I’ve changed my mind.” He continued: “I made a mistake when I chose to set a limit on my service. The work I’ve done will not be finished by the end of this term.” He easily won election to two more terms despite criticism from his former allies in the term limits movement. Nethercutt’s success was hardly unique: through the 2008 elections, no incumbent who backed off a term limit pledge was defeated for reelection on the basis of that issue. Others kept their word but quickly sought other offices. Rep. Tom Coburn, R-Okla., and Bob Schaffer, R-Colo., retired from the House, but later sought Senate seats. Coburn won and Schaffer lost, both in 2004.

The term limits movement was kicked off in 1990 when Colorado became the first state to seek to limit the number of terms that members of Congress could serve. A referendum approved by more than two-thirds of Colorado voters limited House members to six two-year terms and senators to two six-year terms. The measure also set term limits on state legislators and statewide elected offices.

By 1995 backers of term limits had won ballot initiatives or passed laws in at least twenty-three states. In 1995 the Supreme Court ruled in U.S. Term Limits v. Thornton and Bryant v. Hill that under the U.S. Constitution states could not impose limits on congressional terms. These rulings left term limits supporters only one solution: amending the Constitution. But constitutional amendments are difficult to pass: they must receive a two-thirds majority vote from both chambers of Congress and then be ratified by three-fourths (thirty-eight) of the states.

Term limits supporters argued that mandatory retirement after twelve years was necessary to bring new people and viewpoints into Congress, to reduce the constant pressure to get reelected, and to control federal spending, which they said resulted from career politicians getting too close to special interest groups seeking federal funds. Opponents countered that term limits would strip Congress of experienced legislators, diminish the political power of less-populated states that were helped by their members gaining seniority, and would merely speed up, not solve, the problem of legislators getting too friendly with special interest groups. Depriving voters of the right to vote for an incumbent would be undemocratic, opponents added.

In the House the term limits constitutional amendment ran into trouble from the start. The House Judiciary Committee agreed on February 28, 1995, to send its version of the measure to the floor without recommendation. Committee Chairman Henry J. Hyde, R-Ill., staunchly opposed term limits, calling the concept “a terrible mistake, a kick in the stomach of democracy.” He even filed a brief outlining his opposition when the Supreme Court took up the issue in its 1994–1995 term. Hyde, elected in 1974, retired at the beginning of 2007.

On March 29, the House rejected a term limits constitutional amendment that proposed a twelve-year lifetime limit on members of each chamber. The 227–204 vote fell 61 votes short of a two-thirds majority. Forty Republicans voted against the measure, and thirty of the forty who opposed it chaired a committee or subcommittee.

In the Senate, a term limits constitutional amendment limiting senators to two six-year terms and representatives to six two-year terms stalled on the Senate floor in April 1996. A vote to shut off debate on the measure failed, 58–42, two short of the 60 votes needed. All fifty-three Senate Republicans voted for cloture, even though some opposed limiting congressional terms, leaving the Democrats to take the heat for blocking the Senate from moving to an up-or-down vote.

Term limits supporters again tried to pass a constitutional amendment through the House in 1997. In February members voted on eleven versions of the term limits amendment based on different initiatives begun in nine states. The underlying broad measure—restricting House members to six years and senators to twelve—received a simple majority of 217–211. The tally was 69 votes short of the necessary two-thirds majority needed for passage. The House then considered ten proposals beyond the underlying measure. Some would have made the limits retroactive, giving the states the authority to adopt stricter limits, or restricted House members to six or eight years. All were soundly defeated.

Another indication that the term limits movement had run out of steam came at the beginning of the 111th Congress in 2009 when House Democrats repealed a rule that limited chairing a committee to only six years. The limit was imposed by Republicans when they came into power in 1995. The GOP maintained the rule while they controlled the chamber until 2007, and Democrats, having won back the majority that year, maintained it for the 110th Congress before repealing it at the beginning of the 111th Congress.

The movement at the state and local level remained more viable at the beginning of 2009. Fifteen states limited the terms of state legislators, and limits for city and county officials were found in many states.

anything Washington had seen in more than forty years. In the postwar era, only one House freshman class was larger—the 118 newcomers to the 81st Congress in 1949. No other freshman class had so many women (twenty-five) and minorities, including sixteen African Americans, eight Hispanics, and one Korean American.

The Senate freshman class of the 103rd Congress was the largest since 1981, with nine men and five women, including the chamber’s first black woman (Democrat Carol Moseley Braun of Illinois) and its first Native American (Democrat Ben Nighthorse Campbell of Colorado) since Charles Curtis, a Republican from Kansas who stepped down in 1929 to become vice president under Herbert Hoover.

The midterm elections of 1994 brought even more upheaval as the Republicans gained control of both the House and Senate for the first time since 1955. The Democratic loss was truly national in scope. Republicans won 37 million votes in 1994—nearly 9 million more than the party had won in the 1990 midterm elections. It was the first time since 1946 that Republican House candidates received a majority (52.3 percent) of the total House vote. Democrats in 1994 drew almost one million fewer votes than in 1990, continuing a general downward slide in their congressional voting strength that had begun in the mid-1980s.

The GOP tide of 1994 was caused by large surges in voter support for the Republicans and voter apathy for the Democrats. Although Clinton had some successes during his first two years in office, most notably deficit reduction and the North American Free Trade Agreement, his failure in getting Congress to agree to comprehensive health care reform seemed to stall his administration's programs. In addition, Republican candidates reaped the gains they had anticipated from redistricting after the 1990 census.

Money also made the difference for some Republican challengers. According to the Federal Election Commission, Republican candidates had an easier time raising money from political action committees and other sources than in previous years. Conservative groups—from the National Rifle Association to term limit advocates—played active roles in several congressional races. Several GOP freshmen were elected with the prominent support of conservative Christian activists.

Overall, Republicans gained fifty-two House seats in the 1994 elections, increasing their number from 178 to 230. They also swept the Senate, capturing all nine open seats and ousting two Democratic incumbents, thereby gaining control by a margin of 52–48 seats. Adding insult to injury, the day after the general election, Sen. Richard C. Shelby, D-Ala., announced that he was switching parties. The incoming Senate freshman class had eleven Republicans and no Democrats. Since 1914, when the popular election of senators began, there had never been an all-Republican Senate freshman class.

At the start of the 104th Congress, Georgia representative Newt Gingrich became the first Republican Speaker of the House from the South. His ascendancy accompanied the long-anticipated realignment of the South away from Democratic dominance to a Republican majority. For the first time since the end of Reconstruction in the 1870s, Republicans won a majority of southern congressional districts.

In the 1996 elections, voters for the first time reelected a Democratic president while entrusting the House and the Senate to the Republican Party. Clinton, who was almost written off after the disastrous 1994 midterm elections, scored a political comeback by winning handily in November 1996. The Republicans also won their first back-to-back majority in the House since the 1920s. The Democrats managed, however, to cut into the GOP's numbers. Democrats gained a net of nine seats, leaving a party breakdown in the House of 227 Republicans and 207 Democrats, with Bernard Sanders of Vermont as the lone Independent.

In the Senate, the Republicans built on their gains in the 1994 election. For the 105th Congress, the GOP had a solid 55–45 majority over the Democrats. That was the Republicans' highest total in the Senate following any election since 1928.

By 1998 the turnover in the House and Senate seemed to have settled down. All but seven of the 401 House members seeking reelection were returned to office. The Democrats also regrouped in 1998—Clinton's second midterm election—and managed to close the partisan gap even further in the House. The Democrats picked up five House seats, giving the 106th Congress 223 Republicans, 211 Democrats, and one Independent. This twelve-seat majority was the slimmest majority in the House since 1955.

The Senate's partisan breakdown remained the same in 1999 with fifty-five Republicans and forty-five Democrats. Just three of the thirty-four senators up for reelection in 1998 were defeated. Eight Senate freshmen joined the 106th Congress—four Democrats and four Republicans.

The pattern continued in the 2000 elections. Although the GOP maintained control in both chambers, its margin was reduced to nine votes in the House. In the Senate, an exact tie resulted: fifty Democrats and fifty Republicans. However, the Republicans retained control because their party won back the White House, which allowed Richard B. Cheney, the new vice president and presiding Senate officer, to vote to break a tie. This rare arrangement was short-lived, however, as moderate Republican James Jeffords of Vermont left the GOP to become an Independent in June 2001, giving majority control of the Senate to the Democrats for the first time since 1994.

The Republicans regained control of both houses in the 2002 elections. For only the third time in a century, and the first time since 1934, the party in control of the White House won seats in a midterm election. The GOP regained the Senate by winning two seats and expanded its majority in the House by picking up six seats. Only sixteen of the 398 incumbents seeking reelection to the House were defeated, giving House incumbents a success rate of 96 percent. Incumbents in the Senate had a 85.7 percent success rate, as four incumbents out of the twenty-eight seeking reelection lost.

Republicans continued their success in the 2004 elections. President George W. Bush won reelection, while congressional Republicans established solid majorities of 55–45 in the Senate and 232–202 in the House (the sole House independent caucused with the Democrats, effectively giving them 203 seats). However, Republicans faced growing public unease, especially over the costly war in Iraq. The party became increasingly divided, with Congress opposing top Bush initiatives such as his plan to overhaul Social Security. Many voters also lost confidence in the administration when it failed to respond quickly to the devastation Hurricane Katrina inflicted on New Orleans and nearby areas in 2005.

In 2006 the Democrats took back both chambers of Congress, picking up thirty seats in the House and six in the Senate. It was the best showing by Democrats since the 1974 elections, held shortly after the Watergate scandal that drove President Richard Nixon from office, and the first time ever that Republicans failed to pick up a single Democratic seat. Democrats won by tightening their grip in California and in the Northeast, where they picked up both congressional seats in the traditionally Republican state of New Hampshire, as well as seats in Connecticut and New York. They also made inroads in other regions, especially industrial states such as Indiana and Pennsylvania.

The Democrats' triumph was especially impressive in the Senate, where they won nearly every close race and ousted six GOP incumbents. Ominously for Republicans, the Democratic victories took place in several conservative-leaning states, including Virginia, Ohio, and Montana. These victories foreshadowed the presidential race two years later, when these and other states that had been friendly turf for Republicans became closely contested battlegrounds.

In 2008, with the liberal base energized over the presidential candidacy of Barack Obama, Democrats padded their majorities by adding twenty-four House seats and eight Senate seats. This gave them majorities of 257–178 in the House and, with the support of two independents, 59–41 in the Senate. The Democratic triumphs were especially impressive in New England, where they held every House seat, and in southern states such as Virginia and North Carolina, where an influx of northern residents helped provide winning margins to moderate Democratic Senate candidates. Democrats also ran strongly in several Western states such as Colorado and New Mexico, where they picked up both House and Senate seats. With Obama winning the presidential race, Democrats controlled the White House and both chambers of Congress for the first time since 1994.

Nevertheless, incumbents in 2008 won reelection at a high rate. In the House 95 percent seeking reelection won; in the Senate 83 percent won after five of thirty incumbents were defeated. The 111th Congress began with nine new senators and fifty-five new representatives. With several appointments following resignations of senators who joined Obama's cabinet, plus Obama and his running mate Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., of Delaware, the 111th Congress got underway with fourteen new senators.

SHIFTS BETWEEN CHAMBERS

From the early days of Congress, members have sometimes shifted from one chamber to the other. Far fewer former senators have gone to the House than vice versa. In the 1790s, nineteen former representatives became senators and three former senators moved to the House. The same pattern continued through the nineteenth century and into the twentieth. By the end of the twentieth century, it was common to find House members running for the Senate, but senators rarely, if ever, returned to the House. Former senators were more likely to return home to pursue a race for governor, run as their party's vice-presidential candidate, or seek the office of president.

Although both chambers are equal under the law, the Senate's six-year terms offer the officeholder greater stability. That body also has larger staffs and more generous perquisites. A senator's opportunity to make his mark are undoubtedly better in a chamber of one hundred members than in the 435-member House. The Senate's role in foreign affairs may add to its luster, and senators enjoy the prestige of statewide constituencies.

Perhaps the most notable shift from the Senate to the House was Henry Clay's journey in 1811. Giving up a Senate seat from Kentucky, he entered the House and was promptly elected Speaker, a position he used to prod the country to go to war with Britain in 1812. After five terms in the House, Clay returned to the Senate in 1823. Another prominent transfer was that of John Quincy Adams of Massachusetts; he served in the Senate (1803–1808), as secretary of state (1817–1825), as president (1825–1829), and finally in the House (1831–1848).

Only one other former president, Andrew Johnson, returned to Congress in later years. He had served in both houses of Congress (from Tennessee) before he entered the White House. As vice president in 1865, Johnson was elevated to the presidency when Abraham Lincoln was assassinated. Johnson left office in 1869 a bitter man, having survived impeachment charges instigated by his Republican Party. The Tennessee legislature sent him back to the U.S. Senate in 1875, where he served the last five months of his life.

House Elections

THE AUTHORS OF THE U.S. CONSTITUTION recognized that the new government needed an executive to carry out the laws and a judiciary to resolve conflicts arising from them. But it was Congress, the lawmaking body, that the Founders designed to be the heart of the new Republic. There was little question that the new Congress should be bicameral, in accordance with the practice of the English Parliament, which was followed by most of the colonial governments and ten of the thirteen states. As George Mason put it during the Constitutional Convention in 1787, the minds of Americans were settled on two points: “an attachment to republican government [and] an attachment to more than one branch in the Legislature.”

But little agreement existed over how the members of each of the chambers should be chosen. The nationalists insisted that the new government rest on the consent of the people rather than the state legislatures, so they held it essential that at least “the first branch,” or House, be elected popularly. The government “ought to possess . . . the mind or sense of the people at large,” said one of the Framers, James Wilson of Pennsylvania. Those who were suspicious of a national government preferred to have House members be elected by the state legislatures. “The people immediately should have as little to do” with electing the government as possible, said Roger Sherman, because “they want information and are constantly liable to be misled.” Election by the legislatures was twice defeated, however, and popular election for the House agreed to with only one state dissenting.

There was little support for the view that the people also should elect the Senate. Nor did the delegates to the Constitutional Convention think that the House should choose members of the Senate from among persons nominated by the state legislatures. Election of the Senate by the state legislatures was agreed to with only two states dissenting.

By tradition, the Senate is sometimes referred to as the “upper body” of Congress, and the House as the “lower body.” But those terms were not used in the Constitution, and in fact the two chambers are equal in stature and legislative power. Members of the House, indeed, often take offense when their chamber is referred to as the lower body. No bill can become law unless it is passed by both chambers in identical form and signed by the president (or passed over a presidential veto).

Even through representatives naturally resent having the House called the “lower body,” from the earliest days of the Republic, the House has been generally regarded as less prestigious than the Senate. Indeed, the French scholar Alexis de Tocqueville wrote in the 1830s of being struck by “the vulgar demeanor” of the House as compared with the Senate.

Although a seat in the Senate continues to be held in greater esteem today, both chambers have been battered in public opinion polls over the years. (See box, Congressional Characteristics and Public Opinion, p. 924.)

THE PEOPLE’S BRANCH

The House of Representatives was to be the branch of government closest to the people. The members would be popularly elected; the terms of office would be two years so the representatives would not lose touch with their home districts; and the House would be the larger branch, with members having relatively small constituencies.

The lower houses of the state legislatures served as models for the U.S. House. All the states had at least one chamber elected by popular vote. Ten states had two-house legislatures; Georgia, Pennsylvania, and Vermont had popularly elected unicameral legislatures.

Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution set few requirements for election to the House: a representative had to be at least twenty-five years of age, have been a U.S. citizen for seven years, and be an inhabitant of the state from which elected. (See “Constitutional Provisions and Amendments on Elections,” p. 1735, in Reference Materials.)

The Constitution left the qualification of voters to the states, with one overriding principle: the qualifications could be no more restrictive than for the larger branch of each of the states’ own legislatures. At first, most states had some kind of property requirement for voting.

CONGRESSIONAL CHARACTERISTICS AND PUBLIC OPINION

From the early days of the Republic until the present, the American public has criticized the abilities, ethical standards, and performance of members of Congress. Through the years the House has received more criticism than the Senate, perhaps because senators were not elected by popular vote until 1914.

An early but still familiar critique of Congress was written in the 1830s by Alexis de Tocqueville, the French aristocrat, scholar, and astute observer of America. After he had seen both chambers in session, Tocqueville wrote the following in his famous book of observations, Democracy in America:

On entering the House of Representatives at Washington, one is struck by the vulgar demeanor of that great assembly. Often there is not a distinguished man in the whole number. Its members are almost all obscure individuals, whose names bring no associations to mind. They are mostly village lawyers, men in trade, or even persons belonging to the lower classes of society. In a country in which education is very general, it is said that the representatives of the people do not always know how to write correctly.

At a few yards' distance is the door of the Senate, which contains within a small space a large proportion of the celebrated men of America. Scarcely an individual is to be seen in it who has not had an active and illustrious career: the Senate is composed of eloquent advocates, distinguished generals, wise magistrates, and statesmen of note, whose arguments would do honor to the most remarkable parliamentary debates of Europe.

PROFILE OF "AVERAGE" MEMBER

A more modern—and charitable—description of the “average” member of Congress was presented in a popular textbook of the 1960s, American Democracy:

He is a little over 50, has served in Congress for a number of years, and has had previous political experience before coming to Congress, such as membership in his state legislature. He has a college degree, is a lawyer by profession, a war veteran, and, before coming to Congress, was a well-known and popular member of the community. He has been reasonably successful in business or the practice of law, although not so successful that he is sacrificing a huge income in giving up his private occupation for a public job. Congress is clearly not an accurate cross section of the American people but neither is it a community of intellectuals and technicians.

This description was accurate at the time, even to the exclusive use of “he.” By 2009, however, the average member of Congress was harder to describe. Although most members of Congress were still men, about 17 percent (a record high) were women. The average age has also crept up, reaching a high of about fifty-eight in 2009. While the majority of members were white, about 14 percent were minorities. Although Protestants remained in the majority, Roman Catholics composed the single largest religious denomination at 29 percent.

The legal profession had been dominant among members of Congress for most of its history, although most other occupations—including business, banking, public service, education, journalism, farming, law enforcement, and medicine—had been represented. It was not until 1997 that one of the chambers—the House—had more members from a business or banking background than from the law. By the beginning of the 111th Congress in 2009, according to an analysis by the Congressional Research Service, the House had 182 members who claimed a public service background, 175 with a business background, and 152 with a legal background. In the Senate, a bare majority (fifty-one members) still cited a background in law, while thirty-three cited public service and twenty-seven cited business. The principal occupational groups that continued to be underrepresented were the clergy, scientists, and blue-collar workers.

PUBLIC OPINION

Members' professional backgrounds notwithstanding, the American public shows little esteem for Congress as a whole. In Gallup polls taken from 1974 through 2005, it was rare for even half of the country to approve of Congress's performance. Its highest rating came in October 2001, when a Gallup poll found that 84 percent of Americans approved of the way Congress was doing its job in the wake of the September 11 terrorist attacks. The lowest rating, 14 percent, came in July 2008, at a time of high public concern about the direction of the country. Earlier, an unusually low rating came during an ethics scandal that erupted after revelations that hundreds of sitting and former House members had routinely overdrawn their accounts at the House bank. That March 1992 poll found Congress with only an 18 percent job approval rating—and a 78 percent disapproval rating.

However, while the American public often looks with a critical eye on Congress as a whole, individual voters take a kinder view of their own representatives. Indeed, since the end of World War II, House incumbent reelection rates have generally exceeded 90 percent. In 2004, 98 percent of incumbents were returned to office, a number that dropped in 2008 to 95 percent.

Five states required ownership of real estate, five mandated either real estate or other property, and three required personal wealth or payment of public taxes. But the democratic trend of the early nineteenth century swept away most property qualifications, producing practically universal white male suffrage by the 1830s.

Over the years several changes in the Constitution also broadened the franchise. The Fifteenth Amendment (1870) extended the franchise to newly freed slaves; the Nineteenth Amendment (1920) granted the right of suffrage to women; the Twenty-third Amendment (1961) extended the presidential vote to the District of Columbia; the Twenty-fourth Amendment (1964) abolished the poll tax; and the Twenty-sixth Amendment (1971) lowered the voting age from twenty-one to eighteen. In 1965 Congress passed the Voting Rights Act to remove barriers several states and localities had erected to keep blacks and other minorities from voting.

Two-Year Term

Many delegates to the Constitutional Convention preferred annual elections for the House, believing that the body should reflect the wishes of the people as closely as possible. James Madison, however, argued for a three-year term, to allow representatives to gain knowledge and experience in national affairs as well as the affairs of their localities. The delegates compromised on two-year terms.

The two-year term has not been universally popular. From time to time proposals have been made to extend the term to four years. The movement to extend the House term to four years last gained momentum after President Lyndon B. Johnson urged the extension in his 1966 State of the Union address. His proposal received more applause than any other part of his speech.

However, the proposed amendment never emerged from committee. Opponents criticized the proposal's provision that the four-year term coincide with the presidential term. This would create a House of "coattail riders," critics said, and end the minority party's traditional gains in non-presidential election years. This fear of diminishing the independence of the House appeared to be the principal factor that killed the proposal. (See "Election Results, Congress and the Presidency, 1860–2008" p. 1748, in Reference Materials.)

Size of the House

The size of the original House was written into Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution, along with directions to apportion the House according to population after the first census in 1790. Until the first census and apportionment, the thirteen states were to have the following numbers of representatives: Connecticut, five; Delaware, one; Georgia, three; Maryland, six; Massachusetts, eight; New Hampshire, three; New Jersey, four; New York, six; North Carolina, five;

Pennsylvania, eight; Rhode Island, one; South Carolina, five; Virginia, ten. This apportionment of seats—sixty-five in all—thus mandated by the Constitution remained in effect during the first and second Congresses (1789–1793). (Seats allotted to North Carolina and Rhode Island were not filled until 1790, after those states had ratified the Constitution.)

By act of Congress on April 14, 1792, an apportionment measure provided for a ratio of one member for every 33,000 inhabitants and fixed the exact number of representatives to which each state was entitled. Congress enacted a new apportionment measure, including the mathematical formula to be used, every ten years (except 1920) until a permanent law became effective in 1929.

In 1911 Congress set the maximum size of the House at 435 members, where it has remained since the 1912 election (with the exception of a brief period after Alaska and Hawaii became states, when the number temporarily increased to 437). (See Chapter 22, Reapportionment and Redistricting.) National population figures from the 2000 census showed that, on average, each House member represented about 647,000 persons.

Majority Elections

Five New England states at one time or another had a requirement for majority victory in congressional elections. The requirement provided that, to win a seat in the U.S. House, a candidate had to achieve more than 50 percent of the popular vote. If no candidate gained such a majority, new elections were held until one contender succeeded.

The provision was last invoked in Maine in 1844, in New Hampshire in 1845, in Vermont in 1866, in Massachusetts in 1848, and in Rhode Island in 1892. Sometimes, multiple elections were necessary because none of the candidates could achieve the required majority. In the Fourth District of Massachusetts in 1848–1849, for example, twelve successive elections were held to try to choose a representative. None of them was successful, and the district remained unrepresented in the House during the Thirty-first Congress (1849–1851).

In recent years, Georgia and Louisiana required a majority vote to claim victory, a standard that was in use in 2008 when a House member in Louisiana and a senator in Georgia—both incumbents—had to participate in runoffs after the November ballots were counted. The representative lost; the senator won.

Multimember Districts

In the early days of the House, several states had districts that elected more than one representative. For example, in 1824 Maryland's Fifth District chose two representatives, while the remaining seven districts chose one each. In Pennsylvania two districts (the Fourth and Ninth) elected three representatives each, and four districts (the Seventh, Eighth, Eleventh, and Seventeenth) chose two representatives each.

As late as 1838, New York still had as many as five multimember districts—one (the Third) electing four members and four (the Eighth, Seventeenth, Twenty-second, and Twenty-third) choosing two each. But the practice ended in 1842 when Congress enacted a law that “no one district may elect more than one Representative.” The provision was a part of the reapportionment legislation following the census of 1840.

In the modern House, seven states, because of their relatively low populations, send only one member to the House. After congressional redistricting in 2000, these states were Alaska, Delaware, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Vermont, and Wyoming.

Elections in Odd-Numbered Years

Another practice that faded out over the years was the holding of general elections for the House in odd-numbered years. Before ratification of the Twentieth (“Lame-Duck”) Amendment in 1933, regular sessions of Congress began in December of odd-numbered years. Because there was such a long period between elections in November of even-numbered years and the beginning of the congressional session, some states moved congressional elections to odd-numbered years. For example, in 1841 the following states held general elections for representative for the Twenty-seventh Congress, convening that year: Alabama, Connecticut, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Mississippi, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Rhode Island, Tennessee, and Virginia.

The practice continued until late in the century. In 1875 four states still chose their representatives in regular odd-year elections: California, Connecticut, Mississippi, and New Hampshire. But by 1880 all members of the House were being chosen in even-numbered years (except for special elections to fill vacancies). One major problem encountered by states choosing their representatives in odd-numbered years was the possibility of a special session of the new Congress being called before the states' elections were held. Depending on the date of the election, a state could be unrepresented in the House. For example, California elected its U.S. House delegation to the Fortieth Congress (1867–1869) on September 4, 1867, in plenty of time for the first regular session scheduled for December 2. But the Congress already had met in two special sessions—March 4 to March 20 and July 3 to July 20—without any representation from California.

Southern Anomalies

Many of the anomalies in elections of U.S. representatives occurred in the South. That region's experience with slavery, Civil War, Reconstruction, and racial antagonisms created special problems for the regular electoral process.

Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution contained a formula for counting slaves for apportionment purposes: every five slaves would be counted as three persons. Thus, the total population of a state to be used in determining its congressional representation would be the free population plus three-fifths of the slave population.

After the Civil War and the emancipation of the slaves, blacks were fully counted for the purposes of apportionment. The Fourteenth Amendment required that apportionment be based on “the whole number of persons in each State.” On this basis, several Southern states tried to claim immediate additional representation on readmission to the Union. Tennessee, for example, chose an extra U.S. representative, electing him at large in 1868, and claimed that inasmuch as its slaves were now free the state had added to its apportionment population a sufficient number to give it nine instead of eight representatives. Virginia took similar action in 1869 and 1870; South Carolina did it in both 1868 and 1870. But the House declined to seat the additional representatives, declaring that states would have to await the regular reapportionment following the 1870 census for any changes in their representation.

Part of the Fourteenth Amendment affected—or was intended to affect—Southern representation in the House. The second paragraph of the amendment states, “[W]hen the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation [in the U.S. House] shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.”

Designed as a club to force the South to accept black voting participation, the provision was incorporated in the reapportionment legislation of 1872. According to the legislation, the number of representatives from any state interfering with the exercise of the right to vote was to be reduced in proportion to the number of inhabitants of voting age whose right to go to the polls was denied or abridged.

But the provision never was put into effect because of the difficulty of determining the exact number of persons whose right to vote was being abridged and also because of the decline of Northern enthusiasm for forcing Reconstruction policies on the South.

As an alternative to invoking the difficult Fourteenth Amendment provision, Congress often considered election challenges filed against members from the South. When Republicans were in control of the House, several Democrats from the former Confederate states found themselves unseated, often on charges that black voting rights were abused in their districts.

During the Forty-seventh Congress (1881–1883), five Democrats from former Confederate states were unseated; in the Fifty-first Congress (1889–1891), six; and in the Fifty-fourth Congress (1895–1897), seven.

SPECIAL ELECTIONS

When a vacancy occurs in the House, the usual procedure is for the governor of the affected state to call a special election. Such elections may be held at any time throughout the year, and there are usually several during each two-year Congress.

At times there are delays in the calling of special elections. One of the longest periods in modern times when a congressional district went unrepresented occurred after the death of Rep. James G. Polk, D-Ohio (1931–1941, 1949–1959), on April 28, 1959. An election to replace him did not take place until November 1960, when it was held simultaneously with the general election. Because different candidates were nominated for the two races, the winner of the special election, Republican Ward M. Miller, had only two months remaining in his term.

In the days of the lame-duck sessions of Congress, elections for the remainder of a term quite often were held simultaneously with the general election, because the session following the election was an important working meeting that lasted until March 4. However, since the passage of the Twentieth Amendment and the ending of most lame-duck sessions, elections for the remaining two months of a term have become less common. Miller, for example, never was sworn in because Congress was not in session during the period when he was waiting to serve as a representative.

Usually states are more prompt in holding special House elections than was Ohio in 1959–1960. One of the most rapid instances of succession occurred in Texas’s Tenth District in 1963. Democratic representative Homer Thornberry (1949–1963) submitted his resignation on September 26, 1963, to take effect December 20. On the strength of Thornberry’s postdated resignation, a special election was held in his district—the first election was held November 9 and the runoff on December 17. The winner, Democrat J.J. Pickle, was ready to take his seat as soon as Thornberry stepped down. He was sworn in the next day, December 21, 1963.

DISPUTED HOUSE ELECTIONS

Occasionally the full House is called on to settle disputes over the outcome of an election.

“Mississippi Five”

One of the most dramatic election disputes settled by the House in modern times was that of the so-called Mississippi Five in 1965. The governor of Mississippi certified the election to the House in 1964 of four Democrats and one Republican. The Democrats were Thomas G. Abernethy, William M. Colmer, Jamie L. Whitten, and John Bell Williams; the Republican was Prentiss Walker.

Their right to be seated was contested by a biracial group, the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party, formed originally to challenge the seating of an all-white delegation from the state to the 1964 Democratic National Convention. This group, when unsuccessful in getting its candidates on the 1964 congressional election ballot, conducted a rump election in which Annie Devine, Virginia Gray, and Fannie L. Hamer were the winners.

The three women, when they sought entrance to the House floor, were barred. However, Speaker John W. McCormack, D-Mass., asked the regular Mississippi representatives-elect to stand aside while the other members of the House were sworn in. William F. Ryan, D-N.Y., sponsor of the challenge, contended that the regular congressional election in Mississippi was invalid because African Americans had been systematically prevented from voting. A resolution to seat the regular Mississippi delegation was adopted on January 4, 1965, by a voice vote.

Later that year Congress enacted the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which contained strict sanctions against states that practiced discrimination against minority voters.

INCUMBENCY

Getting elected to Congress is not easy. But getting removed from office, once there, has become increasingly uncommon. In the 2004 elections, incumbents had a reelection rate of 98 percent—the highest percentage since World War II. The rate dropped subsequently to the still high margins of 94 percent in 2006 and 95 percent in 2008. Only about a tenth of the House races in 2008 were decided by less than 10 percent of the vote. In 2006 about one in seven House races were decided by less than 10 percent of the vote.

Congressional observers put forward several explanations for the low competitiveness of House elections. One argument is that incumbents, through the redistricting process, have crafted congressional districts that favor the reelection of incumbents, using the latest computer software to draw district lines. Others focus on the powers of incumbency. Once elected, members of the House enjoy a substantial fund-raising advantage over possible challengers. When a member builds a war chest of a million dollars or more, potential opponents often pass on the race. Consequently, the two parties place most of their attention on thirty to forty competitive races, which have determined the effective results of the elections. Still, as Republicans unwittingly demonstrated in 2006 and 2008, an unpopular party can lose seats even in districts that were previously considered safe.

McCloskey-McIntyre Contest

The House easily dismissed two 1984 election challenges but fought for four months over a third race that an investigating panel said was the closest House contest in the twentieth century. Debate on the race took up far more time than almost any other issue the House considered in 1985.

Incumbent Frank McCloskey, a Democrat, appeared to have won reelection to his Indiana Eighth District seat by seventy-two votes. But correction of an arithmetical error (ballots in two precincts had been counted twice) gave Republican challenger Richard D. McIntyre an apparent thirty-four-vote victory. On that basis, the Indiana secretary of state certified McIntyre the winner. But when Congress convened in January 1985, the Democratic-controlled House refused to seat McIntyre, voting instead to declare the seat vacant pending an investigation of alleged irregularities in the election.

A recount completed in January showed McIntyre's lead had increased to 418 votes, after more than 4,800 ballots were thrown out for technical reasons. But a task force of the House Administration Committee, with auditors from the congressional General Accounting Office, conducted its own recount and, on a 2–1 partisan split, concluded in April that McCloskey had won by four votes. The House on May 1, 1985, approved a resolution to seat McCloskey, by a vote of 236–190, with ten Democrats joining the Republicans in voting against it. GOP members walked out of the House chamber in protest, accusing Democrats of stealing the election. Over the course of the four months Republicans had lost a series of votes to seat McIntyre, to get a new election by declaring the seat vacant, and finally to send the issue back to committee with orders to count controversial absentee ballots that the task force had decided not to count.

The Supreme Court May 28, 1985, refused to get involved in the dispute. Without a dissenting vote, it denied Indiana permission to sue the House in the Supreme Court. Earlier in the year, a U.S. district court judge in Washington, D.C., had dismissed a suit brought by McIntyre against House Democrats and House officers, ruling that the House had the constitutional right to judge its own membership. A federal district court in Indiana had dismissed a separate suit filed by McIntyre challenging recount procedures in two of the district's counties and had ruled that the House alone was responsible for determining the validity of contested ballots.

In a 1986 rematch, McCloskey handily defeated McIntyre.

Sanchez-Dornan Dispute

In early 1998 thirteen months of contentious debate with ethnic overtones ended when the Republican-led House refused to overturn the defeat of California Republican Robert K. Dornan by Democrat Loretta Sanchez, a Hispanic woman. Dornan charged the 1996 election in California's Forty-sixth District was stolen by the illegal votes of noncitizens, mostly Hispanics. The House rejected his claim by a 378–33 vote on February 12, 1998.

A special three-member task force had said it found evidence of 748 noncitizen votes, not enough to offset Sanchez's 984-vote victory in November 1996. Republicans said the results nonetheless showed that Dornan's challenge had not been frivolous and that the GOP was not unfairly targeting Hispanic voters. But Democrats characterized the probe as a witch hunt, charging that Republicans sought to unfairly single out and intimidate Hispanic voters. Rep. Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the lone Democrat on the task force, supported the dismissal but criticized the process as contrary to the Federal Contested Elections Act and "an unprecedented intrusion into the privacy of hundreds of thousands of persons who did no wrong." He said the 748 included

FUNDING FOR COMPETITIVE RACES

Almost as soon as they are elected, most members of Congress begin the time-consuming process of raising funds for their reelection campaign. (See Chapter 3, Campaign Finance.) Since House rules prohibit raising funds on government property, most members travel to nearby buildings owned by the two House party committees, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee. Members also attend numerous fund-raising events in Washington, D.C., and in their districts, soliciting checks in increments of $2,000—the maximum amount that individuals may give to candidates each election.

While members of Congress are expected to raise funds for their reelection, party leaders also play a major role in steering funds to the most vulnerable incumbents, many of whom are new to Congress and have yet to accrue prestigious committee assignments. Party leaders encourage political action committees (PACs) run by different corporations to steer contributions to vulnerable members. In addition, members in relatively safe seats raise funds for their campaign accounts, and then transfer some of those funds to endangered members of their party. Deciding which members should benefit from such party leadership programs is a strategic enterprise that sometimes is intended to reinforce party discipline.

In 1999 then House Majority Whip Tom DeLay (R-Texas) brought new organization and strategy to such practices, designing the Retain Our Majority Program (ROMP). DeLay organized a ROMP fund-raiser that delivered about $100,000 in contributions to each endangered incumbent. Most of these Republicans had won election with a little more than 50 percent of the vote. Many of the recipients of the program faced competitive races that were expected to cost as much as $2 million. Democrats responded with a similar program called Frontline.

naturalized citizens and persons who may have inadvertently violated California's absentee voting law.

Dornan, an outspoken conservative who often clashed with Democrats during his eighteen years in the House, accused Sanchez and her supporters of impeding the investigation by noncooperation. Dornan's former Orange County district, once a Republican stronghold, had become a swing district through legal and illegal immigration. In the 1998 election, Sanchez kept her seat in a rematch with Dornan.

PARTY CONTROL SHIFTS

The Republican Party dominated the House in the first three decades of the twentieth century and the Democratic Party controlled it for much of the balance until the Republicans returned to power late in the century.

The Republicans were the majority party in the House from 1901 to 1911 and 1919 to 1931, but, battered by the Depression, they lost the House to the Democrats in the November 1930 elections. Democrats briefly relinquished power in the House after losses in 1946 and again in 1952. But after the 1954 election, the Democrats held control for the next forty years. In all, they controlled the House for sixty of the seventy-four years in the period of 1931–2005. After the Republicans won the House in the 1994 elections, they held it until the Democrats took back the majority in the 2006 elections and increased their margin in 2008.

Democratic Dominance

In the history of Democratic control of the House, 1956 was the watershed year. In that year, Republican President Dwight D. Eisenhower was reelected in a landslide, but his party failed to recapture the House. It was only the second time that had ever happened—and the first since 1848, when Zachary Taylor was elected president while his Whig Party lost control of the House to the Democrats. Taylor won even though the Whigs were beginning to disintegrate over the slavery issue. Political writers said that the results of 1848 and 1956 were flukes caused by war heroes whose support for president crossed party lines. But American voters went on to elect a Republican president and a Democratic House five more times in the twentieth century: in 1968, 1972, 1980, 1984, and 1988.

One theory offered to explain this pattern emphasized the role of the cold war, which seemed a permanent fact of life for nearly half a century. During those years the electorate as a whole seemed more comfortable having Republican presidents handle defense and foreign policy issues, while counting on Democrats in Congress to create and sustain popular domestic programs.

GOP Resurgence in Congress

But with the end of the cold war in 1991, national security seemed less salient as an issue, as Republican President George H.W. Bush learned in 1992. Despite broad foreign policy experience and his triumph in the Persian Gulf War, Bush lost the White House to Arkansas governor Bill Clinton. At the same time, the Democrats in Congress seemed beset by rising resentment of federal tax levels and increasing hostility toward government in general as expensive, overbearing, and inefficient.

Republicans were able to capitalize on this in the 1994 election, ending the Democrats' forty-year domination of the House and eight-year tenure in the Senate. The Democrats lost fifty-two House seats, the biggest loss by a president's party in the House since the 1946 midterm election.

Other records were shattered as well. The election was the first since the end of Reconstruction in the 1870s in which Republicans won a majority of the congressional districts in the South. Democratic Speaker Thomas S. Foley of Washington became the first sitting House Speaker to lose reelection since 1862.

The 1996 election, in which Clinton won another term in the White House and the GOP remained the majority in Congress, was record-producing as well. Never before had voters reelected a Democratic president and simultaneously entrusted both chambers of Congress to the GOP. Moreover, the last time the GOP had returned a majority to the House was following the 1928 election. They had won a narrow majority of House seats again in 1930, but deaths of several Republican members created vacancies that allowed the Democrats to organize the House.

Republicans held on to Congress in the 1998 and 2000 elections but just barely. With the economy healthy and the nation at peace, Clinton's popularity remained high through the 1998 midterm election despite House Republicans' preparations to impeach him on charges that included lying to a federal grand jury about his affair with a White House intern. In what was perceived as a backlash against impeachment, voters sent five more Democrats to the House, making Clinton the first president since Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1934 to gain House seats at midterm. Indeed, it was only the second time since the Civil War that the party not in control of the White House lost seats in a midterm election. The embarrassing setback prompted Newt Gingrich of Georgia, who had led the GOP takeover of the House in 1994, to resign as Speaker.

In 2000 the GOP won a fourth term in the majority for the first time since 1924. But it was also the third straight election in which the Republicans lost House seats. The election resulted in a 221–212 party split, with two independents. It was the closest party split in a House election since 1952. In the Senate the split was even closer: an exact tie, 50–50. (The Senate would later swing to Democratic control as early as June 2001 when one Republican senator became an independent and caucused with the Democrats.)

In 2002 the Republicans gained six seats in the House and also retook control of the Senate. Republicans picked up a net of three seats in the House in 2004. But in 2006, amid the growing unpopularity of the war in Iraq and opposition to many of President George W. Bush's policies, the voters restored the Democrats to power in the House, giving them a 233–202 majority. Democrats won seats in every region of the country, cementing their control in the Northeast and West Coast while picking up seats in the South, Midwest, and Mountain West. Two years later, with Sen. Barack Obama winning the presidential election by a solid margin and voters increasingly concerned over the economy, the Democrats won an additional twenty-four House seats. This gave them their largest majority since the 103rd Congress in 1993–1994. It was a larger majority than the Republicans enjoyed at any time while they controlled the House from 1995 to the beginning of 2007. In 2006 Democrats also won back the Senate by picking up six seats.

The table (Results of House Elections, 1928–2008) beginning on p. 1750 in Reference Materials shows the results of House elections state by state since 1928, the last election of the Republican era that preceded the Great Depression. It goes through the 1930s, when the Democrats gained seats in four consecutive elections from 1930 through 1936; a long period of competitive equilibrium in the House (1938–1958) between New Deal–Fair Deal national Democrats and a loose coalition of Republicans and Southern Democrats; the longer period of dominance by liberal-to-moderate national Democrats, marked by landslide victories in the congressional elections of 1958, 1964, and 1974 that echoed the earlier 1930–1938 period; the conservative hold on power from 1994 to 2006; and the Democratic return to majority status in the 2006 and 2008 elections.

Regional Shifts

The table in the Reference Materials also shows significant shifts in the two parties' regional distribution of seats since the 1960s. The South, once called the "Solid South" because of its solidarity with the Democratic Party, ceased to be solidly Democratic when the national Democratic Party committed itself to civil rights for blacks. But Republican gains in that region were offset by Democratic gains in the Northeast and Midwest. Those two regions had tended to be more Republican than the rest of the country, but Democrats began to gain after their party in 1960 ran the first Catholic candidate for president. In recent elections, Republicans solidified their gains in the South and much of the Great Plains. Democrats, meanwhile, picked up seats once held by centrist Republicans in New England and the West. In New England particularly, the Democratic Party in early 2009 held every congressional seat in that region.

Reapportionment and Redistricting

REAPPORTIONMENT, THE REDISTRIBUTION of the 435 seats in the House of Representatives among the states to reflect shifts in population, and redistricting, the redrawing of congressional district boundaries for the House within the states, are among the most important and contentious processes in the U.S. political system. They help to determine whether Democrats or Republicans, or liberals or conservatives, will dominate the House and whether districts will be drawn to favor the election of candidates from particular racial or ethnic groups.

Reapportionment and redistricting occur every ten years on the basis of the decennial population census required by Article I, section 2, of the U.S. Constitution. States where populations grew quickly during the previous ten years typically gain congressional seats, while those that lost population or grew much more slowly than the national average stand to lose seats. The number of House members for the rest of the states remains the same.

The states that gain or lose seats usually must make extensive changes in their congressional maps. Even those states with stable delegations must make modifications to take into account population shifts within their boundaries, in accordance with U.S. Supreme Court one-person, one-vote rulings.

In most states, the state legislatures are responsible for drafting and enacting the new congressional district map. Thus, the majority party in each state legislature is often in a position to draw a district map that enhances the fortunes of its incumbents and candidates at the expense of the opposing party. As political reporter Ron Elving wrote in 1991: “Some members may find their old district no longer recognizable, or their home located in someone else’s district. Others will find the music has stopped and they are, quite literally, without a seat. Or they will find themselves thrown together in a single district with another incumbent—often from the same party.” Elving said the “scramble to prevent or minimize such political problems involves some of the most brutal combat in American politics, for the power to draw district lines is the power not only to end one politician’s career but often to enfranchise or disenfranchise a neighborhood, a city, a party, a social or economic group or even a race by concentrating or diluting their votes within a given district.”<sup>1</sup>

Among the many unique features to emerge in the nation-creating endeavor of 1787 was a national legislative body (the House of Representatives) whose membership was to be elected by the people and apportioned on the basis of population. In keeping with the nature of the Constitution, however, only fundamental rules and regulations were provided. The interpretation and implementation of the instructions contained in the document were left to future generations.

Within this flexible framework many questions soon arose. How large was the House of Representatives to be? What mathematical formula was to be used in calculating the distribution of seats among the various states? Were the representatives to be elected at large or by districts? If by districts, what standards should be used in fixing their boundaries? Congress and the courts have been wrestling with these questions for more than two hundred years.

Until the mid-twentieth century such questions generally remained in the hands of the legislators. But with the population increasingly concentrated in urban areas, variations in populations among rural and urban districts in a single state grew more and more pronounced. Efforts to persuade Congress and state legislatures to address the issue of heavily populated but underrepresented areas proved unsuccessful. Legislators from rural areas were so intent on preventing power from slipping through their hands that they managed to block reapportionment of the House for a whole decade after the 1920 census.

Not long afterward, litigants began trying to persuade the Supreme Court to order the states to revise congressional district boundaries to reflect population shifts. For years they found the Court unreceptive. There was incremental progress, and then a breakthrough finally occurred in 1964 in the case of Wesberry v. Sanders. In that case, the Court declared that the Constitution required “as nearly as practicable, one man’s vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another’s.”

In the years that followed, the Court repeatedly reaffirmed its one-person, one-vote requirement. Following the 1980 census, several states adopted new maps with districts of nearly equal population that were designed to benefit one party at the expense of the other. These partisan gerrymanders disregarded other traditional tenets of map-drawing, such as making districts compact and respecting the integrity of county and city lines. But as long as the districts in such maps were drawn to be equal in population, these gerrymanders seemed unassailable in the courts.

In 1986, in Davis v. Bandemer, a slim majority of the Supreme Court held that partisan gerrymanders were subject to constitutional review by federal courts. But the Court's decision offered little guidance about an impermissible partisan gerrymander. The justices said that successful challengers to a map on partisan grounds had to "prove both intentional discrimination against an identifiable political group and an actual discriminatory effect on that group." Many redistricting experts thought this set such a high standard that proving the discrimination would be all but impossible. As a result, maps drawn with a clear partisan slant continued to appear in the redistricting done in the 1990s and 2000s.<sup>2</sup>

The Court revisited this issue in 2004 in a case that arose from charges by Pennsylvania Democrats that Republicans had drawn impermissibly partisan districts. The Court rejected the claim, saying that the case had not been proven to the standard set out in Bandemer, but the justices did not—as strongly advocated by four of the most conservative members—overturn the 1986 decision on the grounds that a meaningful standard never could be enunciated. That meant that litigation on partisan gerrymandering could still be brought in the future. Moreover, the Court that same year sent back to a Texas trial court a related case about partisan redistricting in that state. The justices said the lower court should reconsider its earlier action on that case in light of the Pennsylvania decision Vieth v. Jubelirer, but the Court gave little guidance about its expectations. (See "Pennsylvania," p. 963.) The Texas case returned to the Court in 2006, and it overturned a small portion of the redrawn Texas district map on grounds that boundary lines for one district violated provisions of the Voting Rights Act but upheld the mid-decade partisan gerrymander at large because the Texas Democrats failed to offer a workable standard for constitutional review. The question of justiciability, and thus the rulings in Bandemer and Vieth v. Jubelirer, were not revisited. (See "Texas," p. 963.)

Starting in the mid-1980s and continuing through the 1990s, the focus of much redistricting controversy and litigation shifted to the practice of racial gerrymandering—designing constituencies to favor the election of candidates from racial or ethnic groups whose numbers in Congress are lower than their proportion in the general population. Although this issue remained contentious, its importance was diminished for redistricting after the 2000 census following a series of Supreme Court rulings that questioned or prohibited the practice.

In a landmark 1986 ruling (Thornburg v. Gingles), the Supreme Court not only said that gerrymandering that deliberately diluted minority voting strength was illegal but also imposed a requirement that mapmakers do all they can to maximize minority voting strength. The expansion of minority rights sparked by Gingles changed redistricting dramatically. After the 1990 census, redistricting in many states was done with an eye toward creating constituencies designed to elect minority candidates. Those new maps resulted in record numbers of blacks and Hispanics winning House seats in 1992.

As if taken aback by the pace of change wrought by Gingles, the Supreme Court issued a series of rulings in the 1990s that discouraged states from going to extremes to draw districts for minorities. As a result, mapmakers in the twenty-first century found themselves caught between legal and political pressures to enhance election opportunities for minority group members, while adhering to court decisions that posed a rigorous examination of the standards and methods to carry out this obligation.

EARLY HISTORY OF REAPPORTIONMENT

Modern legislative bodies are descended from the councils of feudal lords and gentry that medieval kings summoned for the purpose of raising revenues and armies. The councils represented only certain groups of people, such as the nobility, the clergy, the landed gentry, and town merchants. The notion of equal representation for equal numbers of people or even for all groups of people had not yet begun to develop.

Beginning as little more than administrative and advisory arms of the throne, royal councils in time developed into lawmaking bodies and acquired powers that eventually eclipsed those of the monarchs they served. In England the king's council became Parliament, with the higher nobility and clergy making up the House of Lords and representatives of the gentry and merchants making up the House of Commons. The power struggle between king and council climaxed in the mid-1600s, when the king was executed and a benevolent dictatorship was set up under Oliver Cromwell. Although the monarchy was soon restored, by 1800 Parliament was clearly the more powerful branch of government.

The growth of the powers of Parliament, as well as the development of English ideas of representation during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, had a profound effect on the colonists in America. Representative assemblies were unifying forces behind the breakaway of the colonies from England and the establishment of the newly independent nation.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS

ARTICLE I, SECTION 2

The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature....

Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by Law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative....

ARTICLE I, SECTION 4

The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Place of Choosing Senators....

AMENDMENT XIV

(Ratified July 28, 1868)

Section 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the Executive and Judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Colonists in America generally modeled their legislatures after England's, using both population and land units as bases for apportionment. Patterns of early representation varied. "Nowhere did representation bear any uniform relation to the number of electors. Here and there the factor of size had been crudely recognized," Robert Luce noted in his book Legislative Principles.<sup>3</sup>

The Continental Congress, with representation from every colony, proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence in 1776 that governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed" and that "the right of representation in the legislature" is an "inestimable right" of the people. The Constitutional Convention of 1787 included representatives from all the states. However, in neither of these bodies were the state delegations or voting powers proportional to population.

In New England the town was usually the basis for representation. In the Middle Atlantic region the county frequently was used. Virginia used the county with additional representation for specified cities. In many areas, towns and counties were fairly equal in population, and territorial representation afforded roughly equal representation for equal numbers of people. Delaware's three counties, for example, were of almost equal population and had the same representation in the legislature. But in Virginia the disparity was enormous (from 951 people in one county to 22,015 in another). Thomas Jefferson criticized the state's constitution on the ground that "among those who share the representation, the shares are unequal."<sup>4</sup>

The Framers' Intentions

What, then, did the Framers of the Constitution have in mind about who would be represented in the House of Representatives and how? The Constitution declares only that each state is to be allotted a certain number of representatives. It does not state specifically that congressional districts must be equal or nearly equal in population. It also explicitly does not require that a state create districts at all. However, it seems clear that the first clause of Article I, section 2, providing that House members should be chosen "by the People of the several States," indicates that the House of Representatives, in contrast to the Senate, was to represent people instead of states. (See box, Constitutional Provisions, above.)

The third clause of Article I, Section 2, provided that congressional apportionment among the states must be according to population. "There is little point in giving the states congressmen 'according to their respective numbers' if the states do not redistribute the members of their delegations on the same principle," Andrew Hacker argued in his book Congressional Districting. "For representatives are not the property of the states, as are the senators, but rather belong to the people who happen to reside within the boundaries of those states. Thus, each citizen has a claim to be regarded as a political unit equal in value to his neighbors."<sup>5</sup>

Hacker also examined the Constitutional Convention, The Federalist Papers (essays written by Alexander Hamilton, John Jay, and James Madison in defense of the Constitution), and the state conventions ratifying the Constitution for evidence of the Framers' intentions with regard to representation. He found that the issue of unequal representation arose only once during debate in the Constitutional Convention. The occasion was Madison's defense of Article I, Section 4, of the proposed Constitution, giving Congress the power to override state regulations on "the times ... and manner" of holding elections for members of Congress. Madison's argument related to the fact that many state legislatures of the time were badly malapportioned: "The inequality of the representation in the legislatures of particular states would produce a like inequality in their representation in the national legislature, as it was presumable that the counties having the power in the former case would secure it to themselves in the latter."<sup>6</sup>

The implication was that states would create congressional districts and that unequal districting was undesirable and should be prevented.

Madison made this interpretation even more clear in his contributions to The Federalist Papers. Arguing in favor of the relatively small size of the projected House of Representatives, he wrote in No. 56: "Divide the largest state into ten or twelve districts and it will be found that there will be no peculiar local interests ... which will not be within the knowledge of the Representative of the district."

In the same paper Madison said, "The Representatives of each state will not only bring with them a considerable knowledge of its laws, and a local knowledge of their respective districts, but will probably in all cases have been members, and may even at the very time be members, of the state legislature, where all the local information and interests of the state are assembled, and from whence they may easily be conveyed by a very few hands into the legislature of the United States." Finally, in The Federalist No. 57 Madison stated that "each Representative of the United States will be elected by five or six thousand citizens." In making these arguments, Madison seems to have assumed that all or most representatives would be elected by districts, not at large.<sup>7</sup>

In the states' ratifying conventions, the grant to Congress by Article I, section 4, of ultimate jurisdiction over the "Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections" (except the places of choosing senators) held the attention of many delegates. There were differences over the merits of this section but no justification of unequal districts was prominently used to attack the grant of power. Further evidence that individual districts were the intention of the Founders was given in the New York ratifying convention when Alexander Hamilton said, "The natural and proper mode of holding elections will be to divide the state into districts in proportion to the number to be elected. This state will consequently be divided at first into six."<sup>8</sup>

From his study of the sources relating to the question of congressional districting, Hacker concluded:

There is, then, a good deal of evidence that those who framed and ratified the Constitution intended that the House of Representatives have as its constituency a public in which the votes of all citizens were of equal weight....

The House of Representatives was designed to be a popular chamber, giving the same electoral power to all who had the vote. And the concern of Madison ... that districts be equal in size was an institutional step in the direction of securing this democratic principle.<sup>9</sup>

REAPPORTIONMENT: THE NUMBER OF SEATS

The Constitution made the first apportionment, which was to remain in effect until the first census was taken. No reliable figures on the population were available at the time. The Constitution's apportionment yielded a sixty-five member House. The seats were allotted among the thirteen states as follows: Virginia, ten; Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, eight; Maryland and New York, six; Connecticut, North Carolina, and South Carolina, five; New Jersey, four; Georgia and New Hampshire, three; and Delaware and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, one. This apportionment remained in effect during the First and Second Congresses (1789–1793).

Apparently realizing that apportionment of the House was likely to become a major bone of contention, the First Congress submitted to the states a proposed constitutional amendment containing a formula to be used in future reapportionments. The amendment provided that following the taking of a decennial census one representative would be allotted for every thirty thousand people until the House membership reached one hundred. Once that level was reached, there would be one representative for every forty thousand people until the House membership reached two hundred, when there would be one representative for every fifty thousand people.

First Apportionment by Congress

The states, however, refused to ratify the reapportionment-formula amendment, which forced Congress to enact apportionment legislation after the first census was taken in 1790. The first apportionment bill was sent to the president in March 1792. President George Washington sent the bill back to Congress without his signature—the first presidential veto.

The bill had incorporated the constitutional minimum of thirty thousand as the size of each district. But the population of each state was not a simple multiple of thirty thousand; significant fractions were left over. For example, Vermont was found to be entitled to 2.85 representatives and New Jersey to 5.98. A formula had to be found that would deal in the fairest possible manner with unavoidable variations from exact equality.

Accordingly, Congress proposed in the first apportionment bill to distribute the members on a fixed ratio of one representative for each thirty thousand inhabitants and to give an additional member to each state with a fraction exceeding one-half. Washington's veto was based on the belief that eight states would receive more than one representative for each thirty thousand people under this formula.

A motion to override the veto was unsuccessful. A new bill meeting the president's objections, approved in April 1792, provided for a ratio of one member for every thirty-three thousand inhabitants and fixed the exact number of representatives to which each state was entitled. The total membership of the House was to be 105. In dividing the population of the various states by thirty-three thousand, all remainders were to be disregarded. Thomas Jefferson devised the solution, known as the method of rejected fractions.

Jefferson's Method

Jefferson's method of reapportionment resulted in great inequalities among districts. A Vermont district would contain 42,766 inhabitants, a New Jersey district 35,911, and a Virginia district only 33,187. Jefferson's method emphasized what was considered to be the ideal size of a congressional district instead of what the size of the House ought to be.

The reapportionment act based on the census of 1800 continued the ratio of 33,000, which provided a House of 141 members. The third apportionment bill, enacted in 1811, fixed the ratio at 35,000, yielding a House of 181 members. Following the 1820 census Congress set the ratio at 40,000 inhabitants per district, which produced a House of 213 members. The act of May 22, 1832, fixed the ratio at 47,700, resulting in a House of 240 members.

Dissatisfaction with inequalities produced by the method of rejected fractions grew. Launching a vigorous attack against it, Daniel Webster urged adoption of a method that would assign an additional representative to each state with a large fraction. Webster outlined his reasoning in a report he submitted to Congress in 1832.

The Constitution, therefore, must be understood not as enjoining an absolute relative equality—because that would be demanding an impossibility—but as requiring of Congress to make the apportionment of Representatives among the several states according to their respective numbers, as near as may be. That which cannot be done perfectly must be done in a manner as near perfection as can be.... In such a case approximation becomes a rule.<sup>10</sup>

A method of reapportionment devised by Thomas Jefferson resulted in great inequalities among states. This method was in use until 1840.

Following the 1840 census Congress adopted a reapportionment method similar to that advocated by Webster. The method fixed a ratio of one representative for every 70,680 people. This figure was reached by deciding on a fixed size of the House in advance (223), dividing that figure into the total national representative population, and using the result (70,680) as the fixed ratio. The population of each state was then divided by this ratio to find the number of its representatives, and the states were assigned an additional representative for each fraction more than one-half. Under this method the size of the House dropped. (See Table 22-1, p. 938.)

The modified reapportionment formula adopted by Congress in 1842 was more satisfactory than the previous method, but another change was made following the census of 1850. Proposed by Rep. Samuel F. Vinton of Ohio, the new system became known as the Vinton method.

Vinton Apportionment Formula

Under the Vinton formula Congress first fixed the size of the House and then distributed the seats. The total qualifying population of the country was divided by the desired number of representatives, and the resulting number became the ratio of population to each representative. The population of each state was divided by this ratio, and each state received the number of representatives equal to the whole number in the quotient for that state. Then, to reach the required size of the House, additional representatives were assigned based on the remaining fractions, beginning with the state having the largest fraction. This procedure differed from the 1842 method only in the last step, which assigned one representative to every state having a fraction larger than one-half.

Proponents of the Vinton method pointed out that it had the distinct advantage of fixing the size of the House in advance and taking into account at least the largest fractions. The concern of the House turned from the ideal size of a congressional district to the ideal size of the House itself.

Under the 1842 reapportionment formula, the exact size of the House could not be fixed in advance. If every state with a fraction more than one-half were given an additional representative, the House might wind up with a few more or a few less than the desired number. However, under the Vinton method, only states with the largest fractions were given additional House members and only up to the desired total size of the House.

Vinton Apportionments

Six reapportionments were carried out under the Vinton method. The 1850 census act contained three provisions not included in any previous law. First, it required reapportionment not only after the census of 1850 but also after all the subsequent censuses. Second, it purported to fix the size of the House permanently at 233 members. Third, it provided in advance for an automatic apportionment by the secretary of the interior under the method prescribed in the act.

Following the census of 1860 an automatic reapportionment was to be carried out by the Interior Department. However, because the size of the House was to remain at the 1850 level, some states faced loss of representation and others were to gain fewer seats than they expected. To avert that possibility, an act was approved in 1862 increasing the size of the House to 241 and giving an extra representative to eight states—Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Minnesota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont.

Apportionment legislation following the 1870 census contained several new provisions. The act fixed the size of the House at 283, with the proviso that the number should be increased if new states were admitted. A supplemental act assigned one additional representative each to Alabama, Florida, Indiana, Louisiana, New Hampshire, New York, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Vermont.

With the Reconstruction era at its height in the South, the reapportionment legislation of 1872 reflected the desire of Congress to enforce section 2 of the new Fourteenth Amendment. That section attempted to protect the right of blacks to vote by providing for reduction of representation in the House of a state that interfered with the exercise of that right. The number of representatives of such a state was to be reduced in proportion to the number of inhabitants of voting age whose right to go to the polls was denied or abridged. The reapportionment bill repeated the language of section 2, but the provision never was put into effect because of the difficulty of determining the exact number of people whose right to vote was being abridged.

The reapportionment act of 1882 provided for a House of 325 members, with additional members for any new states admitted to the Union. No new apportionment provisions were added. The acts of 1891 and 1901 were routine as far as apportionment was concerned. The 1891 measure provided for a House of 356 members, and the 1901 statute increased the number to 386.

Problems with Vinton Method

Despite the apparent advantages of the Vinton method, certain difficulties revealed themselves as the formula was applied. Zechariah Chafee Jr. of the Harvard Law School summarized these problems in an article in the Harvard Law Review in 1929. The method, he pointed out, suffered from what he called the “Alabama paradox.” Under that aberration, an increase in the total size of the House might be accompanied by an actual loss of a seat by some states, even though there had been no corresponding change in population. This phenomenon first appeared in tables prepared for Congress in 1881, which gave Alabama eight members in a House of 299 but only seven members in a House of 300. It could even happen that the state that lost a seat was the one state that had expanded in population, while all the others had fewer people.

Chafee concluded from his study of the Vinton method:

Thus, it is unsatisfactory to fix the ratio of population per Representative before seats are distributed. Either the size of the House comes out haphazard, or, if this be determined in advance, the absurdities of the “Alabama paradox” vitiate the apportionment. Under present conditions, it is essential to determine the size of the House in advance; the problem thereafter is to distribute the required number of seats among the several states as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective populations so that no state is treated unfairly in comparison with any other state.<sup>11</sup>

Maximum Membership of House

In 1911 the membership of the House was fixed at 433. Provision was made for the addition of one representative each from Arizona and New Mexico, which were expected to become states in the near future. Thus, the size of the House reached 435, where it has remained as of 2009 with the exception of a brief period, 1959–1963, when the admission of Alaska and Hawaii raised the total temporarily to 437. In 2009 the Democratic-led Congress considered legislation to give the District of Columbia a full voting member of the House and add another seat, most likely a fourth seat for Utah, which would raise the total once again to 437, but this time permanently. The chance for passage of the legislation was slim, however, as the proposal was mired in controversy over whether the District met the Constitution's standard as a "state" as that concept was understood for the other fifty states.

Limiting the size of the House amounted to recognition that the body soon would expand to unmanageable proportions if Congress continued the practice of adding new seats every ten years to match population gains without depriving any state of its existing representation. Agreement on a fixed number made the task of reapportionment even more difficult when the population not only increased but also became much more mobile. Population shifts brought Congress up hard against the politically painful necessity of taking seats away from slow-growing states to give the fast-growing states adequate representation.

A new mathematical calculation was adopted for the reapportionment following the 1910 census. Devised by W.F. Willcox of Cornell University, the new system established a priority list that assigned seats progressively, beginning with the first seat above the constitutional minimum of at least one seat for each state. When there were forty-eight states, this method was used to assign the forty-ninth member, the fiftieth member, and so on, until the agreed upon size of the House was reached. The method was called major fractions and was used after the censuses of 1910, 1930, and 1940. There was no reapportionment after the 1920 census.

1920s Struggle

The results of the fourteenth decennial census were announced in December 1920, just after the short session of the 66th Congress convened. The 1920 census showed that for the first time in history the United States had shifted from a predominately rural population to one in which a majority lived in urban areas. This came as a profound shock to people accustomed to emphasizing the nation's rural traditions and the virtues of life on farms and in small towns as Jefferson had. He once wrote:

Those who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God, if ever He had a chosen people, whose breasts He had made His peculiar deposit for substantial and genuine virtue.... The mobs of great cities add just as much to the support of pure government as sores do to the strength of the human body.... I think our governments will remain virtuous for many centuries as long as they are chiefly agricultural: and this shall be as long as there shall be vacant lands in any part of America. When they get piled up upon one another in large cities as in Europe, they will become corrupt as in Europe.<sup>12</sup>

As their power waned throughout the latter part of the nineteenth century and the early part of the twentieth, farmers clung to the Jeffersonian belief that somehow they were more virtuous than the growing number of urban residents. When faced with the fact that they were in the minority, these country residents put up a strong rearguard action to prevent the inevitable shift of congressional districts to the cities. They succeeded in postponing reapportionment legislation for almost a decade.

Rural representatives insisted that, because the 1920 census was taken as of January 1, the farm population had been undercounted. In support of this contention, they argued that many farm laborers were seasonally employed in the cities at that time of year. Furthermore, midwinter road conditions probably had prevented enumerators from visiting many farms, they said, and other farmers were said to have been uncounted because they were absent on winter vacation trips. The change of the census date to January 1 in 1920 had been made to conform to recommendations of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, which had asserted that the census should be taken early in the year if an accurate statistical picture of farming conditions was to be obtained.

Another point raised by rural legislators was that large numbers of unnaturalized aliens were congregated in northern cities, with the result that these cities gained at the expense of constituencies made up mostly of citizens of the United States. Rep. Homer Hoch, R-Kan., submitted a table showing that, in a House of 435 representatives, exclusion from the census count of people not naturalized would have altered the allocation of seats in sixteen states. Southern and western farming states would have retained the number of seats allocated to them in 1911 or would have gained, while northern industrial states and California would have lost or at least would have gained fewer seats.

A constitutional amendment to exclude all aliens from the enumeration for purposes of reapportionment was proposed during the 70th Congress (1927–1929) by Hoch, Sen. Arthur Capper, R-Kan., and others. But nothing further came of the proposals.

Reapportionment Bills Opposed

The first bill to reapportion the House according to the 1920 census was drafted by the House Census Committee early in 1921. Proceeding on the principle that no state should have its representation reduced, the committee proposed to increase the total number of representatives from 435 to 483. But the House voted 267–76 to keep its membership at 435. The bill then was blocked by a Senate committee, where it died when the 66th Congress expired March 4, 1921.

Early in the 67th Congress, the House Census Committee again reported a bill, this time fixing the total

CONGRESS AND REDISTRICTING

Congress considered several proposals in the post–World War II period to enact new legislation on redistricting. Only one of these efforts was successful—enactment of a measure barring at-large elections in states with more than one House seat.

In January 1951 President Harry S. Truman asked for a ban on gerrymandering, an end to at-large seats in states having more than one representative, and a sharp reduction in the huge differences in size among congressional districts within most states. On behalf of the administration, Emanuel Celler, D-N.Y., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, introduced a bill reflecting these requests but the committee took no action.

Celler regularly introduced his bill throughout the 1950s and early 1960s but it made no headway until the Supreme Court handed down the Wesberry decision in 1964. The House passed a version of the Celler bill in 1965, largely to discourage the Supreme Court from imposing even more rigid criteria. The Senate, however, took no action and the measure died.

In 1967, after defeating a conference report that would have prevented the courts from ordering a state to redistrict or to hold at-large elections until after the 1970 census, Congress approved a measure to ban at-large elections in all states entitled to more than one representative. Exceptions were made for New Mexico and Hawaii, which had a tradition of electing their representatives at large. Both states, however, soon passed districting laws, New Mexico for the 1968 elections and Hawaii for 1970.

Bills to increase the size of the House to prevent states from losing seats as a result of population shifts have been introduced after most recent censuses but Congress has given little consideration to any of them.

In 2005 Rep. John Tanner, D-Tenn., introduced the Fairness and Independence in Redistricting Act, which proposed the establishment of five-member independent commissions to draw each state's congressional district map only once every decade and sought to render the redistricting process less political. Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., R-Wis., had proposed the same concept when he authored the Congressional Districting Reform Act of 1989. Neither bill became law.

membership at 460, an increase of 25. Two states—Maine and Massachusetts—would have lost one representative each and sixteen states would have gained. On the House floor an unsuccessful attempt was made to fix the number at the existing 435, and the House sent the bill back to committee.

During the 68th Congress (1923–1925), the House Census Committee failed to report any reapportionment bill. In April 1926, midway through the 69th Congress (1925–1927), it became apparent that the committee would not produce a reapportionment measure. A motion to discharge a reapportionment bill from the committee failed, however, and the matter once again was put aside.

Coolidge Intervention

President Calvin Coolidge, who previously had made no reference to reapportionment in his communications to Congress, announced in January 1927 that he favored passage of a new apportionment bill during the short session of the 69th Congress, which would end in less than two months. The House Census Committee refused to act. Its chair, Rep. E. Hart Fenn, R-Conn., therefore moved in the House to suspend the rules and pass a bill he had introduced authorizing the secretary of commerce to reapportion the House immediately after the 1930 census. The motion was voted down 183–197.

The Fenn bill was rewritten early in the 70th Congress (1927–1929) to give Congress itself a chance to act before the proposed reapportionment by the secretary of commerce should go into effect. The House passed an amended version of the Fenn bill in January 1929, and it was quickly reported by the Senate Commerce Committee. Repeated efforts to bring it up for floor action ahead of other bills failed. Its supporters gave up the fight when it became evident that senators from states slated to lose representation were ready to carry on a filibuster that would have blocked not only reapportionment but also all other measures.

Hoover Intervention

President Herbert Hoover listed provision for the 1930 census and reapportionment as “matters of emergency legislation” that should be acted on in the special session of the 71st Congress, which was convened on April 15, 1929. In response to this urgent request, the Senate June 13 passed, 48–37, a combined census-reapportionment bill that had been approved by voice vote of the House two days earlier.

The 1929 law established a permanent system of reapportioning the 435 House seats following each census. It provided that immediately after the convening of the 71st Congress for its short session in December 1930, the president was to transmit to Congress a statement showing the population of each state together with an apportionment of representatives to each state based on the existing size of the House. Failing enactment of new apportionment legislation, that apportionment would go into effect without further action and would remain in effect for ensuing elections to the House of Representatives until another census had been taken and another reapportionment made.

Because two decades had passed between reapportionments, a greater shift than usual took place following the 1930 census. California's House delegation was almost doubled, rising from eleven to twenty. Michigan gained four seats; Texas, three; and New Jersey, New York, and Ohio, two each. Twenty-one states lost a total of twenty-seven seats. Missouri lost three seats, and Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky, and Pennsylvania each lost two.

To test the fairness of two allocation methods—the familiar major fractions and the new equal proportions system—the 1929 act required the president to report the distribution of seats by both methods. But pending legislation to the contrary, the method of major fractions was to be used.

The two methods gave an identical distribution of seats based on 1930 census figures. However, in 1940 the two methods gave different results. Under major fractions, Michigan would gain a seat lost by Arkansas; under equal proportions, no change would occur in either state. The automatic reapportionment provisions of the 1929 act went into effect in January 1941. But the House Census Committee moved to reverse the result, favoring the method of equal proportions and the certain Democratic seat in Arkansas over a possible Republican gain if the seat were shifted to Michigan. The Democratic-controlled Congress went along, adopting equal proportions as the method to be used in reapportionment calculations after the 1950 and subsequent censuses and making this action retroactive to January 1941 to save Arkansas its seat.

While politics doubtless played a part in the timing of the action taken in 1941, the method of equal proportions had come to be accepted as the best available. It had been worked out by Edward V. Huntington of Harvard University in 1921. At the request of the Speaker of the House, all known methods of apportionment were considered in 1929 by the National Academy of Sciences Committee on Apportionment. The committee expressed its preference for equal proportions.

Method of Equal Proportions

The method of equal proportions involves complicated mathematical calculations. In brief, each of the fifty states is initially assigned the one seat to which it is entitled by the Constitution. Then priority numbers for states to receive second seats, third seats, and so on are calculated by dividing the state's population by the square root of  $n(n-1)$ , where  $n$  is the number of seats for that state. The priority numbers are then lined up in order and the seats given to the states with priority numbers until 435 are awarded.

The method is designed to make the proportional difference in the average district size in any two states as small as possible. After the 1990 reapportionment, for example, Montana's single district was the most populous, with 803,655 residents, while Wyoming's single district was the least populous, with 453,588 people. The average population per district nationwide was about 572,500. In 2000 the average population per district increased to 647,000. Montana's single district remained the most populous with 902,195 people; Wyoming's single district remained the least populous with 493,782 residents.

Questioning the Count in the 1980s and 1990s

While the method of equal proportions came to be accepted as the best way to apportion House seats among the states, the 1980s and 1990s brought heated debate over a more fundamental issue: the accuracy of the census itself. Members of Congress as well as state and local officials have a keen interest in an accurate population count. In addition to being the basis for reapportionment and redistricting, the census is used to determine the allocation of funding for many federal aid programs.

Concern about the census undercount grew after 1980, when the Census Bureau estimated that it counted about 99 percent of the white population but only about 94 percent of the African American population. Democrats, especially those representing inner-city districts where the undercount was comparatively high, argued unsuccessfully for a statistical adjustment to compensate for undercounting.

The controversy over the 1990 count began even before the census was taken, when the Commerce Department, the parent agency to the Census Bureau, announced in 1987 that it would not statistically adjust the 1990 data. New York City, along with other cities, states, and civil rights organizations, pressed a case in court to force the Census Bureau to make a statistical adjustment to account for people who were missed, including sizable numbers of blacks, Hispanics, and Native Americans. In 1996 the Supreme Court rejected adjusting the census.

But by then, the White House had passed from Republican to Democratic hands, and Commerce Department officials were laying plans to have the Census Bureau use statistical sampling techniques that they said would enhance the accuracy of the 2000 census. The new Republican majority in Congress, however, fought against statistical sampling, worrying that it might lead to politically motivated manipulating of the census. (See box, How Should the Census Count the Population? p. 944.)

The debate continued after the 2000 census. Advocates for minority groups, fearing that many persons of their race or ethnic background were missed in the new count, argued vociferously for a statistical adjustment to the actual head count in the census. But by the time the issue was to be resolved in early 2001, the White House and both houses of Congress were under Republican control, making a decision to statistically adjust the count unlikely. Moreover, in an unexpected development, Census Bureau officials announced on March 1, 2001, that the actual count turned out to be more reliable than expected and warned that the use of the statistical adjustment methods available could make the count less accurate. Their recommendation against adjustment diffused the politics surrounding the issue.

REDISTRICTING: DRAWING THE LINES

Although the Constitution contained provisions for the apportionment of U.S. House seats among the states, it was silent about how the members should be elected. From the beginning most states divided their territory into geographic districts, permitting only one member of Congress to be elected from each district.

But some states allowed would-be House members to run at large, with voters able to cast as many votes as there were seats to be filled. Still other states created what were known as multimember districts, in which a single geographic unit would elect two or more members of the House. At various times, some states used combinations of these methods. For example, a state might elect ten representatives from ten individual districts and two at large.

In the first few elections to the House, Georgia, New Hampshire, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania elected their representatives at large, as did Delaware and Rhode Island, the two states with only a single representative. Districts were used in Maryland, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia. In Connecticut a preliminary election was held to nominate three times as many people as the number of representatives to be chosen at large in the subsequent election. In 1840, twenty-two of the thirty-one states elected their representatives by districts. Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Missouri, New Hampshire, and New Jersey, with a combined representation of thirty-three House seats, elected their representatives at large. Three states, Arkansas, Delaware, and Florida, had only one representative each.

Those states that used congressional districts quickly developed what came to be known as the gerrymander. The term refers to the practice of drawing district lines so as to maximize the advantage of a political party or interest group. The name originated from a salamander-shaped congressional district created by the Massachusetts Legislature in 1812 when Elbridge Gerry was governor. (See box, Origins of the Gerrymander, p. 946.)

Constant efforts were made during the early 1800s to lay down national rules, by means of a constitutional amendment, for congressional districting. The first resolution proposing a mandatory division of each state into districts was introduced in Congress in 1800. In 1802 the legislatures of Vermont and North Carolina adopted resolutions in support of such action. From 1816 to 1826, twenty-two states adopted resolutions proposing the election of representatives by districts.

Sen. Mahlon Dickerson, R-N.J., proposed such an amendment regularly almost every year from 1817 to 1826. It was adopted by the Senate three times, in 1819, 1820, and 1822, but each time it failed to reach a vote in the House. Although the constitutional amendment was unsuccessful, a law passed in 1842 required contiguous single-member congressional districts. That law required representatives to be “elected by districts composed of contiguous territory equal in number to the representatives to which said state may be entitled, no one district electing more than one Representative.”

The districting provisions of the 1842 act were not repeated in the legislation that followed the 1850 census. But in 1862 an act separate from the reapportionment act revived the provisions of the act of 1842 requiring districts to be composed of contiguous territory.

The 1872 reapportionment act again repeated the districting provisions and went even further by adding that districts should contain “as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants.” Similar provisions were included in the acts of 1881 and 1891. In the act of 1901, the words “compact territory” were added, and the clause then read “contiguous and compact territory and containing as nearly as practicable an equal number of inhabitants.” This requirement appeared also in the legislation of 1911. The “contiguous and compact” provisions of the act subsequently lapsed, and Congress has never replaced them.

Several unsuccessful attempts were made to enforce redistricting provisions. Despite the districting requirements enacted in 1842, Georgia, Mississippi, Missouri, and New Hampshire elected their representatives at large that autumn. When the new House convened for its first session, on December 4, 1843, objection was made to seating the representatives of the four states.

The House debated the matter in February 1844. With the Democratic Party holding a majority of more than sixty, and with eighteen of the twenty-one challenged members being Democrats, the House decided to seat the members. However, by 1848 all four states had come around to electing their representatives by districts.

The next challenge a representative encountered over federal districting laws occurred in 1901. A charge was leveled that the existing Kentucky redistricting law did not comply with the reapportionment law of 1901. The charge was aimed at preventing the seating of Democratic representative George G. Gilbert of Kentucky’s Eighth District. The committee assigned to investigate the matter turned aside the challenge, asserting that the federal act was not binding on the states. The reasons given were practical and political:

Your committee are therefore of opinion that a proper construction of the Constitution does not warrant the conclusion that by that instrument Congress is clothed with power to determine the boundaries of Congressional districts, or to revise the acts of a State Legislature in fixing such boundaries; and your committee is further of opinion that even if such power is to be implied from the language of the Constitution, it would be in the last

HOW SHOULD THE CENSUS COUNT THE POPULATION?

Counting the number of people in the United States has never been as easy as one, two, three, and that is not just because of logistical problems. When it comes to the decennial census, the political stakes are huge, and so is the interest in how the count is conducted. The constitutionally mandated census not only provides crucial information for reapportioning U.S. House seats among the states but also supplies the data for drawing district boundaries for state and local public officials and for determining how billions in federal spending is distributed through dozens of grant programs, including Medicaid, educational assistance to poor children, community development block grants, and job training.

Questions about the accuracy of the census are as old as the Republic. A 1998 report issued by the General Accounting Office (GAO) said, "The census has never counted 100 percent of those it should, in part, because American sensibilities would probably not tolerate more foolproof census-taking methods." For instance, the census could be made more precise if people were required to register with the government. But even proposing such a mandate would stir a huge public outcry.

Disputes over the accuracy of the census have intensified since 1911, when Congress fixed the number of representatives at 435. Since then, a gain of representation in any one state can come only at the loss of representation in another. After the 1920 census showed for the first time that the majority of Americans lived in cities, rural interests objected that the farm population had been undercounted. They pressed their case with such tenacity that legislation reapportioning House seats for the 1920s never passed. In 1941 concerns about the accuracy of the census arose when the number of men turning out for the wartime draft was considerably higher than expectations based on the 1940 census.

In the latter years of the twentieth century and in 2000 there was intense controversy about the census' undercounting of certain groups, especially minorities. It became more difficult for government census-takers to make an accurate population count in crowded inner-city neighborhoods and in some sparsely settled rural areas. The undercount issue became a particular concern for major cities and for the Democrats who tended to represent them. They were in the forefront of an effort to persuade the Census Bureau to use a statistical method to adjust the census for the undercount.

The Census Bureau estimated that it did not count 1.4 percent of the total population in 1980, including roughly 5.9 percent of the nation's blacks. In 1991 Commerce Secretary Robert A. Mosbacher, serving in the administration of Republican president George H.W. Bush, said that he would not adjust the 1990 census, even though a postcensus survey found that blacks were undercounted by 4.8 percent, Native Americans by 5 percent, and Hispanics by 5.2 percent. Mosbacher said he was "deeply troubled" by the disproportionate undercount of minorities but decided that sticking with the head count would be "fairest for all Americans."

Several states and cities pursued the matter in court, pressing a suit requesting a statistical adjustment of the census to compensate for the undercount. A 1996 Supreme Court ruling went against them.

By then, though, Democrat Bill Clinton was in the White House, and the Census Bureau was laying the groundwork for a 2000 census that bureau officials said would produce a more accurate count by combining traditional head-tallying methods with large-scale use of statistical sampling techniques. Their plan was to count at least 90 percent of the people in each census tract by tabulating surveys returned in the mail and sending census-takers to interview those who did not respond by mail. Then the remaining population would be estimated by statistically extrapolating the demographics of 750,000 randomly selected homes nationwide.

However, this proposal met with fierce resistance in the Republican-controlled Congress. The GOP majority complained that sampling was unconstitutional and open to political manipulation. "Our Constitution calls for an 'actual enumeration' of citizens, not just an educated guess by Washington bureaucrats," Rep. John A. Boehner, R-Ohio, said. Democrats in Congress retorted that conservatives opposed statistical sampling because they feared it would cost the GOP seats in the House. "They believe not counting certain minorities and the poor is to their political advantage," said Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, D-N.Y.

degree unwise and intolerable that it should exercise it. To do so would be to put into the hands of Congress the ability to disfranchise, in effect, a large body of the electors. It would give Congress the power to apply to all the States, in favor of one party, a general system of gerrymandering. It is true that the same method is to a large degree resorted to by the several states, but the division of political power is so general and diverse that notwithstanding the inherent vice of the system of gerrymandering, some kind of equality of distribution results.<sup>13</sup>

In 1908 the Virginia Legislature transferred Floyd County from the Fifth District to the Sixth District. As a result, the population of the Fifth was reduced from 175,579 to 160,191 and that of the Sixth was increased from 181,571 to 196,959. The average for the state was 185,418. The newly elected representative from the Fifth District, Democrat Edward W. Saunders, was challenged by his opponent in the election on the ground that the Virginia law of 1908 was null and void because it did not conform with the federal reapportionment law of 1901 or with the constitution of Virginia. Had the district included the counties that were a part of it before enactment of the 1908 state legislation, Saunders's opponent would have had a majority of the votes.

The majority of the congressional investigating committee upheld the challenge and recommended that Saunders's opponent be seated. For the first time, it appeared that the districting legislation would be enforced, but the House did not take action on the committee's report and Saunders was seated.

Who Draws the House District Lines?

Drawing congressional district boundaries following a decennial census has traditionally been a political event

With the Republican House and the Democratic White House at a standoff on allowing statistical sampling in the 2000 census, the dispute headed to the courts. When the Supreme Court heard arguments on the case in late 1998, justices expressed reluctance to get involved in what looked essentially like a partisan fight.

In January 1999 in Department of Commerce v. House of Representatives, the court issued an equivocal 5–4 ruling that seemed likely to spur further litigation. Pleasing Republicans, the court majority said that amendments to the Census Act added in 1976 forbade “the use of sampling in calculating the population for purposes of apportionment.” House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., declared, “The administration should abandon its illegal and risky polling scheme and start preparing for a true head count.”

But Democrats took some solace in the Court majority’s position that the Census Act “required” that sampling be used for other purposes (such as establishing the population formulas used to distribute some federal grant monies), if the Census Bureau and the secretary of Commerce deemed it “feasible.”

The ruling led the Clinton administration to plot a course to produce two sets of numbers in the 2000 census—a count based on traditional methods to be used for reapportionment, and an adjusted count to be used for distributing federal money and for other purposes, possibly including redistricting within the states. That decision drew a harsh response from Republicans in Congress. Rep. Dan Miller, R-Fla., chairman of the House Census Committee, said, “It will absolutely be a disaster if we have a two-number census.... If we try to divide the census, we’ll have two failed censuses.” Democrats, and racial and ethnic minority groups, pressed hard for Census to statistically adjust the numbers of the 2000 count for purposes of redistricting within states but were not optimistic that the White House—by then back in the control of Republicans—would do this. But in early March 2001, Census Bureau professionals unexpectedly said they could not guarantee that an adjusted number for redistricting would be any better than the actual head count Republicans favored using. The professionals said unresolved issues in using statistical adjustment could not be solved before the legal deadline of April 1, 2001, to release redistricting data to the states. Thus, no adjusted data was produced for the 2000 census.

ILLEGAL ALIENS

Members of Congress and other public officials also have taken a strong interest in the traditional inclusion of illegal aliens in the census. Some complain that the Census Bureau’s effort to count all people living in the United States has unfair political ramifications.

The Fourteenth Amendment states that “representatives shall be apportioned among the several states according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each state, excluding Indians not taxed.” The Census Bureau has never attempted to exclude illegal aliens from the census—a policy troubling to states that fear losing House seats and clout to states with large numbers of illegal aliens.

The Census Bureau does not have a method for excluding illegal aliens, although it has studied some alternatives. Some supporters of the current policy say that any questions used to separate out illegal aliens could discourage others from responding, thus undermining the accuracy of the census.

OVERSEAS PERSONNEL

For the 1990 census the Commerce Department reversed a long-standing policy and counted military personnel and dependents stationed overseas. “Historically we have not included them because the census is based on the concept of usual residence,” said Charles Jones, associate director of the Census Bureau. “People overseas have a ‘usual residence’ overseas.” An exception was made once in 1970 during the Vietnam War. This policy was continued in the 2000 census. For the purposes of reapportionment, overseas personnel were assigned to the state each individual considered home.

under the control of state legislatures, usually with the participation of the state’s governor. A few states use a commission or another type of procedure, usually with an eye toward reducing the partisan political calculations behind the map-drawing. In addition, courts have been inserted into the process in some states where divided control of legislative houses and the governor’s office prevented creating a final plan. In those cases, courts imposed their own plan.

Both parties largely accepted this system for decades. The party controlling a state legislature would draw congressional and state legislative districts favorable to their candidates that were then fixed for the next five elections. Some legislatures would seek configurations likely to increase their party’s numbers; others would draw lines principally to protect incumbents of both parties. Rarely were the mapmakers concerned with increasing political competition through districts with partisan balance and the potential for frequent turnover in seats.

By the 2000 census the process was increasingly in disarray. A number of factors contributed to this development:

- An unmistakable decline in competitive races became evident in much of the country as most incumbents were returned to office.
- Hard-ball political efforts were made in a few states to redraw district lines—mid-decade redistricting—to enhance a party’s chances of winning elections.
- The narrow divisions between the two major political parties in federal elections dramatically raised the stakes of winning congressional seats to achieve a majority in the U.S. House.

NOTE: Number in parentheses indicates state's House seats under 2000 reapportionment.

Procedures varied in these states, but generally they involved appointments made by legislative leaders, thereby retaining some connection to the basic political process used in most states. Indiana employed a system using legislative leaders but allowed the governor to set lines if the parties could not agree.

A proposed amendment to the Ohio constitution in 2005 would have added it to the list of states with independent commissions. The proposal put to the Ohio electorate would have empanelled a five-member redistricting commission, composed of two members selected by the two most tenured judges from different parties on the Ohio state courts of appeals and three additional members chosen by the first two commission appointees from a pool of applicants, with party officials, officeholders, candidates, and lobbyists being ineligible for selection. Ohio voters, as with those in California, overwhelmingly voted against the measure, 71 percent against and only 21 percent in favor.

Iowa was technically not a commission state, but it used a procedure unlike any other. In Iowa the redistricting task was given to neither the legislature nor a commission.

Instead a nonpartisan legislative staff (the Legislative Service Bureau of the general assembly) developed a redistricting plan for the legislature to accept or reject. If the first plan is rejected, a second one is submitted. If that is rejected, a third is submitted but that one, unlike the earlier two, could be amended by the legislators. At that point the normal operation of politics could, theoretically, come into play. The Iowa redistricting for both the state legislature and the U.S. House was done without any political data or information about incumbents. Iowa law specified that districts could not be drawn to favor a political party, incumbent, or any other person or group. Iowa law provided that counties could not be split for the congressional seats and must be contiguous. The Iowa code also defined a compact district as those "which are square, rectangular, or hexagonal in shape to the extent permitted by natural or political boundaries."

Reformers point to these exacting standards as models for other states. Other observers, although admiring Iowa's approach, note that the state is small (it had only five House seats) and had a homogeneous population in which minorities were not a significant consideration as they were in many other locations, particularly southern states, where provisions of the Voting Rights Act were important.

Arizona voters in 2000 approved Proposition 106, which set up the Arizona Independent Redistricting Commission (AIRC). The AIRC quickly became for reformers an even brighter poster child for redistricting reform because, unlike Iowa, it attempted to permanently remove the redistricting process from politicians and place it in the hands of a citizens' commission. The AIRC consisted of five members, selected from a list of twenty-five applicants—reviewed by the state supreme court—that had ten Democrats and ten Republicans. Another five from minor parties or independent registered voters were on the list also. The AIRC tightly restricted the political activities of any candidate for the three years before a commission was established. Four commission members were selected by the majority and minority leaders of the state house and senate, and the four commissioners then selected a chair from the list of five minor or independent persons on the list.

The AIRC instructions to the members were exact: draw lines that satisfied the federal Voting Rights Act and created districts of equal populations that were compact and contiguous. Proposition 106 went on to delineate a number of other factors including respecting communities of interest, following geographic features as much as possible, and, to the extent practicable, creating competitive districts. The first use of the AIRC after the 2000 census produced congressional seats without difficulty. But the legislative districts ran into many challenges and had to be redone three times.

Competitiveness and Incumbency

The widely noted tendency in elections after the 2000 redistricting of returning incumbents to office, often by large margins, became a rallying cry for reformers pushing for changes in the system of drawing lines. The two concepts were closely linked, and few denied that much of the 2000 redistricting effort was aimed at enhancing incumbency and thereby diminishing competitiveness. The much-publicized successful effort in Texas to redraw lines for the 2004 election—originally ordered by the court so that the delegation better reflected the GOP orientation in the state—was made to strengthen the position of Republicans. By contrast, the unsuccessful attempt in Colorado to redraw court-ordered lines was an apparent Republican effort to increase the reelection chances of a Republican who barely won in 2002. Both actions, however, drew unexpected and unwanted attention to many of the conditions that reformers said needed fixing. (See “Mid-Decade Redistricting and Partisan Gerrymandering,” p. 961.)

Most reformers, however, agreed that achieving competitiveness in drawing district lines was difficult, particularly when other important values such as equal population and meeting voting rights standards had to be considered.

In addition many noncompetitive districts simply reflected the political preferences of the population in the area. Still critics, such as Schwarzenegger in California, pointed to the election returns as evidence that legislatures that drew new congressional district lines had all but obliterated meaningful challenges in House races.

In the 2004 elections, only thirteen seats in the House (3 percent of all 435 seats) switched parties and just seven incumbents were defeated in the general election. Another two lost in the primaries. The reelection rate of incumbents was 98 percent. That rate changed abruptly in the following two elections. In 2006 the rate for incumbents dropped to 94 percent and remained there in 2008. Nevertheless, Democrats during this four-year period picked up a total of fifty-five House seats. Defenders of the existing methods of redistricting point to the Democratic gains as evidence that political issues—in these years the waning popularity of President George W. Bush—could produce substantial change no matter how district lines were drawn. Critics, however, retorted that an incumbent reelection rate well into the 90 percent range only proves that most congressional districts are not competitive. They note that reelection rates dropped below 90 percent only seven times since 1946 and only twice in the four redistrictings from 1970 to 2000.

Historical numbers also supported the argument that incumbents were coming back to Washington, D.C., in unprecedented numbers after the 2000 redistricting. For comparable elections (the first after a decennial census), the percentage of incumbents seeking reelection was 93.6 percent in 1972. It dropped to 90.1 percent in 1982 and to 88.3 percent in 1992. It then jumped to 96 percent in 2002. (The 2002 election was the first since 1990 that the reelection rate for House and Senate incumbents both surpassed 95 percent.) For 2004, 99.2 percent of non-Texas incumbents who sought reelection won. When Texas was included, 98.2 percent of incumbents won. Numbers at this level were not uncommon in the half-century before 2000, but high incumbency victory rates usually occurred four to five election cycles after a redistricting—when members had become better known to the electorate.

The partisan lineup in House districts was reflected in another emerging phenomenon: increasing congruency in presidential and House voting in congressional districts. By one count, only fifty-nine districts in 2004 produced a split result with one party winning the presidential vote and the other party the House vote—the lowest number of split districts since at least 1952. One major contributor to this trend was the emergence of Republican control in many of the southern states. The South had been moving to the Republican presidential column for several decades, but until late in the twentieth century the region still voted for Democratic representatives. As the latter changed and the GOP increasingly took House seats, the voting patterns for president and representatives became better aligned.

GERRYMANDERING: THE SHAPE OF THE HOUSE

There are basically three types of gerrymanders. One is the partisan gerrymander, where a single party draws the lines to its advantage. Another is the proincumbent (sometimes called the “bipartisan” or “sweetheart”) gerrymander, where the lines are drawn to protect incumbents, with any gains or losses in the number of seats shared between the two parties. In states where control of the state government is divided, proincumbent gerrymanders are common.

A third form of gerrymandering is race-based, where lines are drawn to favor the election of candidates from particular racial or ethnic groups. Initially, racial redistricting referred to the practice of drawing lines to scatter minority voters across several districts so they would not have a dominant influence in any. But the 1965 Voting Rights Act and numerous court rulings produced a new version of racial gerrymandering: designing constituencies to concentrate minority voters. These majority-minority districts were more likely to elect a minority candidate.

Sweetheart gerrymandering rarely attracted much attention but it significantly affected the House. “Districts get more Democratic for Democrats and more Republican for Republicans. Competition is minimized,” said Bernard Grofman, a political scientist at the University of California at Irvine. Incumbent reelection rates were high for most elections after World War II, in part because a proincumbent spin in much of the line drawing diminished the prospects for dramatic change in the House’s membership.

Still, redistricting at least increased the possibility of turnover because most states must redraw their districts to accommodate population shifts within the state as well as the gain or loss of any seats. Typically, some House members would retire rather than stand for election in redesigned districts.

Partisan gerrymanders did not always achieve their goals. Indiana Republicans redrew their map in 1981 with the hope that it would turn the Democrats’ congressional majority into a 7–3 Republican edge. Instead, by the end of the decade Democrats held a 7–3 advantage. But Texas Republicans in 2003—in the second redistricting of the decade—redrew a number of districts with the specific aim of defeating as many as seven Democratic incumbents and succeeded in all but one race.

But without question, gerrymandering during redistricting is an important determinant of which party controls the House. Many political analysts predicted that the 1980 reapportionment would alter the political makeup of the House, because most of the states that lost seats tended to favor liberal Democrats, while the states that gained seats were more likely to favor Republicans or conservative Democrats. But in part because of Democrats’ gerrymandering successes in the state redistricting battles their party remained in control of the House throughout the 1980s.

In the 1990 reapportionment, the shift of House seats to more conservative areas in the South and West continued but successful gerrymandering by Democrats helped the party hold its House majority in 1992. Finally in 1994 a broad surge of support for Republican candidates helped the GOP take control of the House, which they held until the 2006 elections. Population changes recorded in the 2000 census showed a continuing trend toward states that have voted more Republican than Democratic in recent years, some of which received additional House members under the 2000 reapportionment. (See Table 22-2, p. 947.)

As a result, the redistricting following the 2000 census—particularly within Republican-leaning states—was expected to be a highly contentious exercise. As it turned out, in the initial round of redistricting Democrats and Republicans tacitly agreed that their primary interest was in protecting incumbents. As a result, much of the drawing of lines focused on creating districts incumbents could hold. There was less emphasis on designing districts for competitive party advantage. The end result was that incumbents were protected—96 percent won reelection in 2002 and 98 percent won their seats back in 2004. However, those numbers dropped, to 94.1 percent in 2006 and to 94.3 percent in 2008, as Democrats recaptured control of Congress, in the process winning all Republican seats in the Northeast and picking up many GOP-leaning areas elsewhere.

MAJOR SUPREME COURT CASES ON REDISTRICTING

After the long and desultory battle over reapportionment in the 1920s, those who were unhappy over the inaction of Congress and the state legislatures began taking their cases to court. At first, the protesters had no luck. But as the population disparities grew in both federal and state legislative districts and the Supreme Court began to show a tendency to intervene, the objectors were more successful.

Finally, in a series of decisions beginning in 1962 with Baker v. Carr, the Court exerted great influence over the redistricting process, ordering that congressional districts as well as state and local legislative districts be drawn so their populations would be as nearly equal as possible.

Wood v. Broom

Baker v. Carr essentially reversed the direction the Court had taken in 1932. Wood v. Broom was a case challenging the constitutionality of a Mississippi redistricting law because it violated the standards of the 1911 federal redistricting act. The question was whether the federal act was still in effect. That law, which required that districts be separate, compact, contiguous, and equally populated, had been neither specifically repealed nor reaffirmed in the 1929 reapportionment act.

Speaking for the Court, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes ruled that the 1911 act, in effect, had expired with the approval of the 1929 apportionment act and that the standards of the 1911 act therefore were no longer applicable. The Court reversed the decision of a lower federal court, which had permanently enjoined elections under the new Mississippi redistricting act.

That the Supreme Court upheld a state law that failed to provide for districts of equal population was almost less important than the minority opinion that the Court should not have heard the case. Justices Louis D. Brandeis, Harlan F. Stone, Owen J. Roberts, and Benjamin N. Cardozo, while concurring in the majority opinion, said they would have dismissed the Wood case for “want of equity.” The “want-of-equity” phrase in this context suggested a policy of judicial self-limitation with respect to the entire question of judicial involvement in essentially political questions.

Colegrove v. Green

Not until 1946, in Colegrove v. Green, did the Court again rule in a significant case dealing with congressional redistricting. The case was brought by Kenneth Colegrove, a political science professor at Northwestern University, who alleged that congressional districts in Illinois, which varied between 112,116 and 914,053 in population, were so unequal that they violated the Fourteenth Amendment’s guarantee of equal protection of the laws. A seven-member Supreme Court divided 4–3 in dismissing the suit.

Justice Felix Frankfurter gave the opinion of the Court, speaking for himself and Justices Stanley F. Reed and Harold H. Burton. Frankfurter’s opinion cited Wood v. Broom to indicate that Congress had deliberately removed the standard set by the 1911 act. He also said that he, Reed, and Burton agreed with the minority that the Court should have dismissed the case. The issue, Frankfurter said, was of a peculiarly political nature and therefore not meant for judicial interpretation.... The short of it is that the Constitution has conferred upon Congress exclusive authority to secure fair representation by the states in the popular House and has left to that House determination whether states have fulfilled their responsibility. If Congress failed in exercising its powers, whereby standards of fairness are offended, the remedy lies ultimately with the people.... To sustain this action would cut very deep into the very being of Congress. Courts ought not to enter this political thicket. The remedy for unfairness in districting is to secure state legislatures that will apportion properly, or to invoke the ample powers of Congress.

Frankfurter also said that the Court could not affirmatively remap congressional districts and that elections at large would be politically undesirable.

In a dissenting opinion Justice Hugo L. Black, joined by Justices William O. Douglas and Frank Murphy, maintained that the district court did have jurisdiction over congressional redistricting. The three justices cited as evidence a section of the U.S. Code that allowed district courts to redress deprivations of constitutional rights occurring through action of the states. Black’s opinion also rested on an earlier case in which the Court had indicated that federal constitutional questions, unless frivolous, fall under the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Black asserted that the appellants had standing to sue and that the population disparities violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

With the Court split 3–3 on whether the judiciary had or should exercise jurisdiction, Justice Wiley B. Rutledge cast the deciding vote in Colegrove v. Green. On the question of justiciability, Rutledge agreed with Black, Douglas, and Murphy that the issue could be considered by the federal courts. Thus, a majority of the Court participating in the Colegrove case felt that congressional redistricting cases were justiciable.

Yet on the question of granting relief in this specific instance, Rutledge agreed with Frankfurter, Reed, and Burton that the case should be dismissed. He pointed out that four of the nine justices in Wood v. Broom had felt that dismissal should be for want of equity. Rutledge saw a want-of-equity situation in Colegrove v. Green as well. “I think the gravity of the constitutional questions raised [is] so great, together with the possibility of collision [with the political departments of the government], that the admonition [against an avoidable constitutional decision] is appropriate to be followed here,” Rutledge said. Jurisdiction, he thought, should be exercised “only in the most compelling circumstances.” He thought that “the shortness of time remaining [before the forthcoming election] makes it doubtful whether action could or would be taken in time to secure for petitioners the effective relief they seek.” Rutledge warned that congressional elections at large would deprive citizens of representation by districts, “which the prevailing policy of Congress demands.” In the case of at-large elections, he said, “the cure sought may be worse than the disease.” For all these reasons he concluded that the case was “one in which the Court may properly, and should, decline to exercise its jurisdiction.”

Changing Views

In the ensuing years, law professors, political scientists, and other commentators increasingly criticized the Colegrove doctrine and grew impatient with the Supreme Court’s

DRAWING DISTRICTS

Drawing congressional and legislative district boundaries evolved in the nearly four decades years leading up to 2008 from a primitive task of a few specialists to a highly sophisticated art form in which anyone with a few thousand dollars, a modicum of knowledge about databases, and lots of discipline could participate.

Even with the quasi-democratization of the process, the task was largely left to a handful of experts working in the shadow of political party “stakeholders,” a multitude of court decisions, and—increasingly—citizen activists who alleged the entire system needed reform.

ADVANCE OF TECHNOLOGY

The development and plunging costs of technology tools since the 1970s was at the center of advanced methods of drawing lines with a diamond-like precision that came to full flower in the 1990s and after the 2000 census.

Before that, the job of redrawing districts was a manual affair involving huge paper maps of census information (practitioners preferred two-story offices with high ceilings and lots of wall space) often overlaid with layer upon layer of acetate on which to draw lines. Computers, to the extent they were used, were mainframes often owned by corporations and banks that would lend mapmakers calculating time overnight.

Personal computers, still a rarity in the early 1980s when redistricting occurred for that decade, did not become part of the mapmakers’ arsenal until the 1990s. Such software as was available to help with placing district lines was extremely expensive. Programs in the 1980s could cost as much as $75,000. By the 1990s costs were down to the $20,000 range and ten years later for as little as $3,000. When married to modern personal computers with great speed and vast memory costing perhaps $3,000, remapping opened up to many more participants.<sup>1</sup> reluctance to intervene in redistricting disputes. At the same time, the membership of the Court was changing, and the new members were more inclined toward judicial action on redistricting.

In the 1950s the Court decided two cases that laid some groundwork for its subsequent reapportionment decisions. The first was Brown v. Board of Education, the historic school desegregation case, in which the Court decided that an individual citizen could assert a right to equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment, contrary to the “separate but equal” doctrine of public facilities for white and black citizens.

By 1962 only three members of the Court that decided Colegrove remained: Justices Black and Douglas, dissenters in that case, and Justice Frankfurter, aging spokesperson for restraint in the exercise of judicial power.

By then it was clear that malapportionment within the states no longer could be ignored. By 1960 not a single state

But the march of technology was much more than muscle computers and relatively inexpensive programs. The precise line-drawing that later emerged depended on development of geographic information systems (GIS) programs, which is computer software that integrates geography and demographic data from the Census Bureau with state-specific numbers such as election results collected at local levels, usually the precinct. This information then may be distributed to the even-smaller block level by use of an algorithm related to voting-age population and demographics. A key part of the evolution was the Census Bureau’s creation in the 1980s, in preparation for the 1990 census, of a mapping system called Topologically Integrated Geographic Encoding and Referencing (TIGER), which produced a uniform map of the United States. This gave an accurate picture of the location of people, geography (including roads, buildings, rivers, and lakes), and concentrations of groups. When used with databases of political information, the redistricting business crossed over from a specialized cottage industry into a sophisticated business that gave politicians an unprecedented power to select the voters they preferred to have in their districts, both in Congress and state legislatures.

PARTISAN CONSIDERATIONS

The power of technology gave mapmakers the ability to draw almost any district configuration they were asked to provide. But experts who did the drawing emphasized that their computers and databases were little more than tools. They typically would give a litany of considerations that circumscribed their activities. At the top of any list was the partisan interest—or party agenda—of an organization seeking a particular district realignment. Closely related was the interest of a member, especially the concerns of an incumbent to have a district in which he or she could reasonably expect to be given continued employment by the voters.

legislative body existed in which there was not at least a two-to-one population disparity between the most and the least heavily populated districts. For example, the disparity was 242–1 in the Connecticut House, 223–1 in the Nevada Senate, 141–1 in the Rhode Island Senate, and 9–1 in the Georgia Senate. Studies of the effective vote of large and small counties in state legislatures between 1910 and 1960 showed that the effective vote of the most populous counties had slipped while their percentage of the national population had more than doubled. The most lightly populated counties, meanwhile, advanced from a position of slight overrepresentation to one of extreme overrepresentation, holding almost twice as many seats as they would be entitled to by population size alone. Predictably, the rural-dominated state legislatures resisted every move toward reapportioning state legislative districts to reflect new population patterns.

Population imbalance among congressional districts was substantially lopsided but by no means so gross. In Texas

Legal requirements also played a huge role in drawing lines. For more than forty years, the courts—especially the Supreme Court—laid down rules that defined the shape and composition of districts. Most important were the earliest rules that districts have equal population (for congressional districts) or only slight deviations in numbers (for legislative districts). Later came decisions on redistricting action that limited the opportunities for minority groups to gain increased representation. Congress played an important role in this regard with the 1965 Voting Rights Act. Originally redistricting was not part of the law's legal underpinnings but over time courts expanded its logic to the shape and nature of districts. Other traditional considerations in redistricting also shaped the way mapmakers went about their tasks. These included such factors as compactness, contiguity, preservation of political subdivisions (such as a county), and sometimes a "community of interest" that—when it could be defined—showed a relationship among the inhabitants. A few states mentioned competitiveness as a value to be considered, but this was not a major element in most districting.

WHAT MAPMAKERS DO

Given the power of technology and the array of restrictions and considerations that constrain line-drawing, the persons who do the actual district configurations usually work under a set of "tools" or approaches that guide their activities.<sup>2</sup>

- Pairing. This assigns more than one incumbent to a district that elects just one. Pairing is a technique used by a party controlling redistricting against the other party.
- Packing. This is when one party puts large numbers of the other party's supporters in a single district, more than needed—in effect—wasting the votes.
- Cracking. This scatters an incumbent's supporters into two or more districts to dilute his or her support. It was seen in raw form in the 2003 Texas redistricting engineered by Republicans that was designed to defeat as many as seven Democrats.
- Dislocation. This shifts key parts of an incumbent's district to another location. It can be a small or large change.
- Populating. This is a device characteristic of legislative redistricting because congressional districts, under Supreme Court decisions, must be almost exactly equal in population, although even in these cases some jumbling of numbers can influence outcomes because a "person" counted in the census is not necessarily a voter. When it is done for state legislatures it involves putting a lot of a party's voters in a district or districts while providing a disproportionately smaller number in districts for the other party. If done artfully it can produce more district majorities for the smaller population groupings.
- Contiguity or Layout. This technique draws a district in way that a candidate must cover a lot of territory, often involving an array of subdivisions such as counties or partial counties, and cities and towns. It makes for oddly-shaped districts and can significantly increase the difficulty and cost of campaigning.

the 1960 census showed the most heavily populated district had four times as many inhabitants as the most lightly populated. Arizona, Maryland, and Ohio each had at least one district with three times as many inhabitants as the least populated. In most cases rural areas benefited from the population imbalance in congressional districts. As a result of the postwar population movement out of central cities to the surrounding areas, the suburbs were the most underrepresented.

Baker v. Carr

Against this background a group of Tennessee city-dwellers successfully broke the long-standing precedent against federal court involvement in legislative apportionment problems. For more than half a century, since 1901, the Tennessee Legislature had refused to reapportion itself, even though a decennial reapportionment based on population was specifically required by the state's constitution. In the meantime, Tennessee's population had grown and shifted dramatically to urban areas. By 1960 the House legislative districts ranged from 3,454 to 36,031 in population, while the Senate districts ranged from 39,727 to 108,094. Appeals by urban residents to the rural-controlled Tennessee Legislature proved fruitless. A suit brought in the state courts to force reapportionment was rejected on grounds that the courts should stay out of legislative matters.

City-dwellers then appealed to the federal courts, stating that they had no redress. The legislature had refused to act for more than half a century, the state courts had refused to intervene, and Tennessee had no referendum or initiative laws. They charged that there was "a debasement of their votes by virtue of the incorrect, obsolete and unconstitutional apportionment" to such an extent that they were being deprived of their right to equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Supreme Court on March 26, 1962, handed down its historic decision in Baker v. Carr, ruling 6–2 in favor of the Tennessee city-dwellers. In the majority opinion, Justice William J. Brennan Jr. emphasized that the federal judiciary had the power to review the apportionment of state legislatures under the Fourteenth Amendment’s Equal Protection Clause. “The mere fact that a suit seeks protection as a political right,” Brennan wrote, “does not mean that it presents a political question” that the courts should avoid.

In a vigorous dissent, Justice Frankfurter said the majority decision constituted “a massive repudiation of the experience of our whole past” and was an assertion of “destructively novel judicial power.” He contended that the lack of any clear basis for relief “catapults the lower courts” into a “mathematical quagmire.” Frankfurter insisted that “there is not under our Constitution a judicial remedy for every political mischief.” Appeal for relief, Frankfurter maintained, should not be made in the courts but “to an informed civically militant electorate.”

The Court had abandoned the view that malapportionment questions were outside its competence. But it stopped there and in Baker v. Carr did not address the merits of the challenge to the legislative districts, stating only that federal courts had the power to resolve constitutional challenges to maldistribution of voters among districts.

Gray v. Sanders

Almost exactly one year after its decision in Baker v. Carr, the Court revisited the apportionment issue in Gray v. Sanders, which set the landmark “one-person, one-vote” rule. In Gray, which involved state districts not congressional ones, the Court found that Georgia’s county-unit primary system for electing state officials—a system that weighted votes to give advantage to rural districts in statewide primary elections—denied voters equal protection of the laws. All votes in a statewide election must have equal weight, the Court held:

How then can one person be given twice or 10 times the voting power of another person in a statewide election merely because he lives in a rural area or because he lives in the smallest rural county? Once the geographical unit for which a representative is to be chosen is designated, all who participate in the election are to have an equal vote—whatever their race, whatever their sex, whatever their occupation, whatever their income, and wherever their home may be in that geographical unit. This is required by the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The concept of “we the people” under the Constitution visualizes no preferred class of voters but equality among those who meet the basic qualification. The idea that every voter is equal to every other voter in his State, when he casts his ballot in favor of one of several competing candidates, underlies many of our decisions.... The conception of political equality from the Declaration of Independence to Lincoln’s Gettysburg Address, to the Fifteenth, Seventeenth, and Nineteenth Amendments can mean only one thing—one person, one vote.

The Rule Applied

The Court’s rulings in Baker and Gray concerned the equal weighting and counting of votes cast in state elections. In 1964, deciding the case of Wesberry v. Sanders, the Court applied the one-person, one-vote principle to congressional districts and set equality as the standard for congressional redistricting.

Shortly after the Baker decision was handed down, James P. Wesberry Jr., an Atlanta resident and a member of the Georgia Senate, filed suit in federal court in Atlanta claiming that the gross disparity in the population of Georgia’s congressional districts violated Fourteenth Amendment rights of equal protection of the laws. At the time, Georgia districts ranged in population from 272,154 in the rural Ninth District in the northeastern part of the state to 823,860 in the Fifth District in Atlanta and its suburbs. District lines had not been changed since 1931. The state’s number of House seats remained the same in the interim, but Atlanta’s district population—already high in 1931 compared with the others—had more than doubled in thirty years, making a Fifth District vote worth about one-third that of a vote in the Ninth.

In June 1962 the three-judge federal court divided 2–1 in dismissing Wesberry’s suit. The majority reasoned that the precedent of Colegrove still controlled in congressional district cases. The judges cautioned against federal judicial interference with Congress and against “depriving others of the right to vote” if the suit should result in at-large elections. They suggested that the Georgia Legislature (under court order to reapportion itself) or the U.S. Congress might better provide relief. Wesberry then appealed to the Supreme Court.

On February 17, 1964, the Supreme Court ruled in Wesberry v. Sanders that congressional districts must be substantially equal in population. The Court, which upheld Wesberry’s challenge by a 6–3 decision, based its ruling on the history and wording of Article I, section 2, of the Constitution, which states that representatives shall be apportioned among the states according to their respective numbers and be chosen by the people of the several states. This language, the Court stated, meant that “as nearly as is practicable, one man’s vote in a congressional election is to be worth as much as another’s.”

The majority opinion, written by Justice Black and supported by Chief Justice Earl Warren and Justices Brennan, Douglas, Arthur J. Goldberg, and Byron R. White, said, “While it may not be possible to draw congressional districts with mathematical precision, that is no excuse for ignoring our Constitution’s plain objective of making equal representation for equal numbers of people the fundamental goal for the House of Representatives.”

In a strongly worded dissent, Justice John M. Harlan asserted that the Constitution did not establish population as the only criterion of congressional districting but left the matter to the discretion of the states, subject only to the supervisory power of Congress. “The constitutional right which the Court creates is manufactured out of whole cloth,” Harlan concluded.

The Wesberry opinion established no precise standards for districting beyond declaring that districts must be as nearly equal in population “as is practicable.” In his dissent Harlan suggested that a disparity of more than 100,000 between a state’s largest and smallest districts would “presumably” violate the equality standard enunciated by the majority. On that basis, Harlan estimated, the districts of thirty-seven states with 398 representatives would be unconstitutional, “leaving a constitutional House of 37 members now sitting.”

The Court’s decision also did not make any reference to gerrymandering because it discussed only the population, not the shape of districts. In a separate opinion handed down the same day as Wesberry, the Court dismissed a challenge to congressional districts in New York City, which had been brought by voters who charged that Manhattan’s “silk-stocking” Seventeenth District had been gerrymandered to exclude blacks and Puerto Ricans.

Strict Equality

Five years elapsed between Wesberry and the Court’s next application of constitutional standards to congressional districting. In 1967 the Court hinted at the strict stance it would adopt two years later. With two unsigned opinions, the Court sent back to Indiana and Missouri for revision those two states’ congressional redistricting plans because they allowed variations of as much as 20 percent from the average district population.

Two years later Missouri’s revised plan returned to the Court for full review. By a 6–3 vote, the Court rejected the plan. It was unacceptable, the Court held in Kirkpatrick v. Preisler, because it allowed a variation of as much as 3.1 percent from perfectly equal population districts. Thus, the Court made clear its stringent application of the one-person, one-vote rule to congressional districts.

There was no “fixed numerical or percentage population variance small enough to be considered de minimis and to satisfy without question the ‘as nearly as practicable’ standard,” Justice Brennan wrote for the Court. “Equal representation for equal numbers of people is a principle designed to prevent debasement of voting power and diminution of access to elected Representatives. Toleration of even small deviations detracts from these purposes.”

The only permissible variances in population, the Court ruled, were those that were unavoidable despite the effort to achieve absolute equality or those that could be legally justified. The variances in Missouri could have been avoided, the Court said.

None of Missouri’s arguments for the plan qualified as “legally acceptable” justifications. The Court rejected the argument that population variance was necessary to allow representation of distinct interest groups. It said that acceptance of such variances to produce districts with specific interests was “antithetical” to the basic purpose of equal representation.

Justice White dissented from the majority opinion, which he characterized as “an unduly rigid and unwarranted application of the Equal Protection Clause which will unnecessarily involve the courts in the abrasive task of drawing district lines.” White added that some “acceptably small” population variance could be established. He indicated that considerations of existing political boundaries and geographical compactness could justify to him some variation from “absolute equality” of population.

Justice Harlan, joined by Justice Potter Stewart, dissented, saying that “whatever room remained under this Court’s prior decisions for the free play of the political process in matters of reapportionment is now all but eliminated by today’s Draconian judgments.”

PRACTICAL RESULTS OF COURT’S RULINGS

As a result of the Supreme Court’s decisions of the 1960s, nearly every state was forced to redraw its congressional district lines—sometimes more than once. By the end of the decade, thirty-nine of the forty-five states with more than one representative had made the necessary adjustments.

However, the effect of the one-person, one-vote standard on congressional districts did not bring about immediate population equality in districts. Most of the new districts were far from equal in population because the only official population figures came from the 1960 census. Massive population shifts during the decade rendered most post-Wesberry efforts to achieve equality useless.

But redistricting based on the 1970 census resulted in districts that differed only slightly in population from the state average. Among House members elected in 1972, 385 of 435 represented districts that varied by less than 1 percent from the state average district population.

By contrast, only nine of the districts in the 88th Congress (elected in 1962) deviated less than 1 percent from the state average; 81, from 1 to 5 percent; 87, from 5 to 10 percent; and 236, 10 percent or greater. Twenty-two House members were elected at large.

The Supreme Court made only one major ruling concerning congressional districts during the 1970s. In 1973 the Court declared the Texas congressional districts, as redrawn in 1971, unconstitutional because of excessive population variance among districts. The variance between the largest and smallest districts was 4.99 percent. The Court returned

GEOGRAPHICAL PATTERNS IN REAPPORTIONMENT, 1790–2000

The history of reapportionment and redistricting is, in reality, a history of the geographic reallocation of political power in the United States. Since the Constitution requires that representation in the U.S. House of Representatives be based on population, the decennial census report of population location, growth, and decline is the basis of the reassignment of seats. To a great extent the geography of population theoretically and realistically determines the geography of internal American political power.

The reallocation of seats in the House occurs at four spatial scales: local, intrastate, intraregional, and between regions. For example, in a large urban area seats are reallocated locally when an inner city declines in population while the suburbs expand. Within states, seats are reallocated when one portion of the state declines, such as farm areas, while others increase, such as metropolitan areas. In certain instances seats are adjusted between states but remain in the same region, such as what happened in the mid-twentieth century with population movement from New York City across the Hudson River into northern New Jersey.

While all the above types of movement are politically important, the loss and gain of House seats from one distant region to another is a critical phenomenon in understanding the political history of the United States. The regional reallocation of House seats is in actuality the reallocation of state and sectional power. Because the differences in regional issues, political parties, and ideology tend to be more pronounced than the differences in local or state issues, the reallocation of power has had a profound effect on U.S. politics and elections. Four major demographic/apportionment areas are identified that have had a long-term effect on American history. These four areas are discussed below, including discussion of the current era of Snowbelt to Sunbelt migration.<sup>1</sup>

WESTWARD EXPANSION: ORIGINAL AND NEW STATES

The population of the United States has expanded westward since the origin of the country. At the first census in 1790 virtually all of the population was east of the Appalachian Mountains in the original thirteen states. In fact, the 1790 congressional reapportionment put only the two Kentucky representatives, of the 105 total, in the "Trans Appalachian West." As population steadily migrated into Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Louisiana, these states became eligible for statehood and representation in the House. As this process continued into the early nineteenth century, more and more new "western" states entered the Union.

For the original coastal states the new western states evoked two political concerns. The first question was the theoretical size a nation could be and still be a democracy. This was an important matter since the United States was the first experiment of a large democratic society. The second question was of a more immediate and practical nature, the loss of influence and political power by the original states to the western states. In the 1790 census less than 2 percent of the House seats were in the west, but by 1850, 43 percent of the House seats were in the West. In addition, this was not just a sheer loss of power but was a political concern in that some of the major issues of the West were in conflict with the more established coastal regions. For example, in the early nineteenth century, to encourage settlement, the western states, both in the northern and southern parts of the region, lobbied for low-priced public land sales. Since public land sales were the major source of government revenue at this time, the original states in the North and South, however, favored high-priced public land sales. The nation in the early nineteenth century slowly became divided, not simply by North-South issues, but North-South-West issues, especially in certain areas of public policy.

SLAVERY: FREE AND SLAVE STATES

In the framing of the Constitution and in the first seventy years of U.S. history, slavery was the single most important and divisive issue. By the late 1780s slavery was banned in the northern states while permissible and expanding in the southern states. As western states entered the Union, northern ones adopted antislavery constitutions while southern ones allowed slavery. The nation was regionally divided on moral, ethical, and economic lines with respect to the institution of slavery.

This significant division was the centerpiece of the allocation of power in Congress. In the Senate a careful equilibrium of admittance of free states and slave states was conducted to sustain a balance of sectional political power. However, the allocation of power in the House of Representatives could not be controlled and manipulated in this way. The soil and general farming conditions in the northern states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa far exceeded the conditions in the westward expanding southern states. In the agricultural Midwest a dense farm settlement and expanding population grew westward along the northern tier.

At the first census in 1790 approximately half (46 percent) of the House seats were allocated to southern slave states. By the eve of the Civil War, the 1860 census House allocation was approximately one-third (35 percent) to the slave states. Northern interests were in control of the U.S. House, not only with respect to slavery issues, but also other public policy concerns such as internal improvements and tariff policy. Perhaps even more profoundly important than control of the House was the shift in power of the electoral college and election of the president. Since the electoral college allocates votes to each state based on the number of senators plus representatives, a shift of power in the U.S. House means a shift of power in electing the president. At the beginning of the nation there was a rough balance in population, and therefore of electoral votes, between the North and the South. However, because of the geographic change in population growth the case to a three-judge federal panel, which adopted a new congressional district plan.

Precise Equality

Following the 1980 census, several federal courts accepted or imposed redistricting maps that achieved population equality but were drawn for blatant partisan purposes. In Missouri a federal court accepted the Democrats' remap proposal over the Republican plan because its districts were more nearly equal in population. The Democratic map obtained population equality by dismantling a district in a part of the state where population was growing and and settlement, northerner Abraham Lincoln was elected president in 1860 without carrying a single Deep South or Border state.

URBANIZATION: RURAL, URBAN AND SUBURBAN PLACES

Urbanization, the process of people moving from rural to urban areas, has been a significant feature of American population geography throughout the nation's history. As incredible as it may seem today, the 1870 United States census reported no urban area with a population greater than 1 million. The period of rapid urbanization, 1870–1930, coincides with the period of rapid industrialization of America. This industrialization has a specific regional geography. The first textile manufacturing and later the development of the iron and steel industry and heavy manufacturing began in the North and Northeast. In the corridor from Baltimore to Boston and extending westward to the industrial cities of the Erie Canal and lower Great Lakes, northern urban manufacturing areas boomed while other regions did not have the same rapid development. The population concentration of the North and Northeast became so dominant that William McKinley carried the electoral vote in 1896 with little support from the South, Great Plains, and interior West. Large foreign immigration to northern cities in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was supplemented by large internal migration of blacks and whites from the rural South, especially in the period from 1914 to the 1960s.

The rural to urban shift in power in the United States reached its psychological climax in the famous census report of 1920. For the first time in American history the Census Bureau enumerated more people in cities than in rural areas. The nation was changing from its agrarian roots, and shockwaves were felt in farm states and rural congressional districts. So profound was the emotional impact of this census report that for the first and only time in U.S. history the U.S. Congress did not reapportion the House after a census count. (See “1920s Struggle,” p. 940.)

At the height of high-density, urban industrial America, in the 1920s and 1930s, approximately one-fourth (26 percent) of congressional districts were extremely small with a high concentration of urban working-class and other population. Since the end of World War II, the American urban landscape has changed once again, with the sprawl and suburbanization of population and congressional districts. This change has lessened the power of inner-city representatives and has heightened the level of more suburban issues and perhaps has even changed the political party makeup and political ideology of some districts.

MODERN ERA: SUNBELT AND THE SNOWBELT

The United States was the dominant world industrial power in the post–World War II era of the late 1940s and 1950s. In the 1960s the nation began the transition from an industrial to postindustrial society. Manufacturing declined or became less tied to the specific geographic locations of such items as iron ore and coal. In addition to economic changes, the structure of the U.S. population changed to a more mature, mobile, and affluent society. As the American economy and demography changed, profound differences were taking place in regional population growth, decline, and movement.

The census reports of 1960 through 2000 show a significant shift of population from the North and Northeast to the South and Southwest. Demographers have termed this the rise of the Sunbelt or the Snowbelt-to-Sunbelt migration. The causes of this change are many and complex. As the name implies, there is a weather and climate aspect to the movement. However, the climate explanation is tied to a number of technological changes such as the wide-spread growth and development of air conditioning, which have made large areas of the South and desert Southwest pleasantly habitable year around. The mobility of manufacturing in the postindustrial society saw movement of employment from the high cost of living and high cost of labor North to the relatively cheaper South. The growth of retirement, tourism, and high-tech industries seems to benefit the warmer and more scenic regions of the United States.

The Sunbelt population revolution has caused an incredible shift in American political power. Table 22-3 lists the states in order of their gain and loss of representation in the House from 1960 to 2000. Sixteen states gained power in the House during this period, all of which are in the southern tier of states, that is, the Sunbelt. Three states have gained significant political power, the so-called “growth pole” states of California, Florida, and Texas. Twenty-six states lost representation in this period, with virtually all of these in the North, Midwest, and Great Plains. Significantly, the largest losers are the old northern industrial states of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, and Massachusetts. In all, seventy-five seats (17 percent of the House) have been shifted from one section of the country to another in recent decades. Figure 22-1 maps the 2000 reapportionment and is an excellent illustration of the Sunbelt era reallocation geography of House seats.

The recent shift of House seats from the North to the South and West is symbolic of the continuing change of regional power throughout United States history. In the Sunbelt era, as in previous eras, political party support, political ideology and many political issues have a specific regional/geographic context. For example, the political ideology and recent political party support in national elections is different in New York than in Texas. In the current Sunbelt-Snowbelt demographic era, some political parties and some issue areas gain and others lose in importance.

1. Extensive discussion of each demographic political era and each decennial apportionment is found in Kenneth C. Martis and Gregory Elmes, The Historical Atlas of State Power in Congress, 1790–1900 (Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 1993).

preserving a district in central St. Louis that had been losing population. The plan cost one Republican incumbent his seat.

Michigan's map for the 1980s offered an extreme example of fealty to precise population equality. In 1982 a court-imposed redistricting plan created sixteen congressional districts with exactly equal populations—514,560. The state's two other districts each had a population of just one person fewer—514,559. To achieve that equality, however, the line for many districts cut through many small cities and towns, dividing their residents between two or three different districts.
